Resolved, That the Government of the United States is a Federal Union and was formed by the people of the several States in their sovereign capacity; that the rights and powers of the United States Government are defined and limited by the Federal Constitution, and these rights and powers cannot be enlarged nor diminished except by an amendment to the Constitution.

Resolved, That the rights of the States have the same sanction and security in the Constitution as the rights and powers of the Federal Government, and that local domestic government by the several States within the limits of the Constitution is absolutely necessary for the preservation of the liberties of the citizen and the continuance of our republican system of government.

Resolved, That the doctrine that a State has the right to secede from the Union is in conflict with the idea of a "perpetual union," as contemplated by the Constitution, and should be regarded as being forever extinguished by the results of the recent civil conflict.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to entertaining these resolutions for consideration at the present time?

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, and others objected.

NORFOLK NAVY-YARD.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That for the purpose of enabling the committee of this House on naval affairs to discharge the duties imposed upon them by the adoption of House resolution instructing them to inquire into certain alleged abuses and frauds at the different navy-yards of the United States, and the misapplication of appropriations made for the construction of the eight vessels of war authorized by act of Congress approved February 10, 1875, &c., it is hereby directed that said committee through the subcommittee appointed for that purpose, consisting of Messrs. WHITTHORNE, WILLIS, and DANFORD, shall conduct said investigation so far as it relates to the Norfolk navy-yard at said yard.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twelve o'clock and twenty minutes, and the first business in order is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill which has just been reported.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am instructed by the committee to move that this bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made a special order for Wednesday next after the morning hour, and from day to day until disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

SELMA SEIBERT.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the same committee, reported back the claim of Selma Seibert, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES E. HOVEY.

Mr. KNOTT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the memorial of Charles E. Hovey, asking relief in respect to a contract with the Secretary of the Treasury, and moved that the same be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS T. NICHOLLS.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 26) to remove the political disabilities of Francis T. Nicholls, of Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. Is the bill accompanied with an application from the person asking relief?

Mr. KNOTT. It is.

Mr. CONGER. I would suggest that if the announcement is made each time a bill of this character is reported that it is accompanied by a petition from the person to be relieved, it would save some trouble.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regards that as a very proper suggestion.

LEWIS PELHAM.

Mr. HURD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 68) for the relief of Lewis Pelham, and moved that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

LAND CLAIMS IN MISSOURI.

Mr. BUCKNER, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CATHARINE STRUBLING.

Mr. CANDLER, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Catharine Strubling, asking an adjustment for certain lands improperly taken and kept from her by the Government of the United States; which was laid on the table.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS OF 1812

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 897) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers of the war of 1812," approved February 14, 1871, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

FIRST LIEUTENANT HENRY JACKSON.

Mr. GLOVER, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JAMES A. HILE.

Mr. GLOVER also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. BURCHELL.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committe of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JAMES KREPS.

Mr. THORNBURGH, also from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of James Kreps, late a private in the Third Independent Battery of Ohio Volunteers, also late a private in Company A, Third Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JANE E. SLAMM.

Mr. WHITTHORNE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 1111) granting a pension to Jane E. Slamm, widow of Levi D. Slamm, deceased, late a paymaster in the United States Navy; which was laid on the table.

CAPTAIN EGBERT THOMPSON.

Mr. MILLS, from the same committee, reported back adversely the bill (H. R. No. 667) for the relief of Captain Egbert Thompson; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM WELSH.

Mr. MILLS also, from the same committee, reported back adversely joint resolution (H. R. No. 33) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate William Welsh to the grade of commander in the United States Navy; which was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN ROSECRANTS.

Mr. JENKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1080) for the relief of John Rosecrants, of Rochester, New York, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT M. BARR.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported back the petition for bounty by Robert M. Barr, father of William B. Barr, deceased, late a private in Company E, Seventy-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

RUTH ELLEN GREULAND.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greuland; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM D. COBAUGH.

Mr. JENKS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1597) granting a pension to William D. Cobaugh; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM R. DUNCAN.

Mr. RAINEY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1598) granting a pension to William R. Duncan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS C. ELLIOTT.

Mr. PURMAN, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Francis C. Elliott; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARGARET E. WEST.

Mr. YEATES, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1044) granting a pension to Margaret E. West; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

Mr. YEATES also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late a brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance United States Army; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JANE A. HARRIS.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the panying report, ordered to be printed.

OTIS B. ANDERSON.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia, also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1601) granting a pension to Otis B. Anderson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. SINNICKSON, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 104) granting a pension to Edward C. Wheelock, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed

MARGARET E. COGBURN.

Mr. SINNICKSON also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1602) granting a pension to Margaret E. Cogburn; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANNIE FARLEY.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 318) granting a pension to Annie Farley, with the recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

PROHIBITION OF AMERICAN CITIZENS HOLDING SLAVES.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1603) to prohibit American citizens from holding slaves in foreign countries; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REGULATING ELECTIONS IN UTAH.

Mr. SPRINGER also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1604) regulating elections in the Territory of Utah, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have introduced this bill at the request of Hon. R. N. Baskin, the contesting Delegate from the Territory of Utah, and asked that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I cannot say at this time that I will favor the bill as it has been prepared by its friends in the Territory of Utah. But I ask that the bill be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and that a letter from Mr. Baskin be read in explanation of the present election law in Utah and of the bill now printed.

The SPEAKER. Is it lengthy?

Mr. SPRINGER. It is only three pages in length.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The letter is as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, January 19, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of sending you a bill regulating elections in this Territory, and have to request that you will introduce the same in the House and have it referred to the appropriate committee. The Legislative Assembly of the Territory has passed an election law requiring the ballots to be numbered and the number of each voter's ticket set opposite his name on the poll list, so that it may be known how each person votes. If any Mormon votes against the church ticket persecution and disfellowship is sure to follow. Besides this, a law has been passed allowing women to vote, and is so worded that every one "who is the widow, wife, or daughter of a native-born or naturalized citizen" has the right to vote. As a consequence, girls and alien women who are either lawful or polygamous wives vote, and in many cases the women so voting have not been in the Territory but a few months. There is no penalty provided to punish either fraud or illegal voting; even the most ordinary safeguards have been omitted. There is but one judge of election in each precinct, and he is not required to canvass the votes in any given time or in the presence of any one; and, as a consequence, the ordinary practice is for the judge, after the polls are closed, to take the ballots away and count the votes at his pleasure. Sometimes the counting is not done for several days after the election. In short, under the law as it now stands the church can poll 50,000 votes as easy as 10,000. Under such a system the liberal element will never be able to overcome the church majority. On the other hand, give us a fair law, and one under which the disaffected Mormons can vote without detection, and deprive alien women and girls under age from the right to vote, and in a short time we will be able to overcome this monstrosity of polygamic theocracy at the ballot-box.

R. N. BASKIN.

WILLIAM M. SPRINGER.

CLAIMS OF VIRGINIA FOR THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HUNTON, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Virginia, requesting her Senators and Representatives in Congress to urge the passage of a law for the adjustment and payment of the claims of Virginia for advancements made and sums lent to the United States during the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SOLDIERS OF THE WAR OF 1812 AND THEIR WIDOWS.

Mr. HUNTON also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1605) amending the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812, and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman ask to have this bill put on its passage?

Mr. HUNTON. The bill is reported from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812, and I desire that it be now put on its passage.

Mr. CONGER. I move that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last evening I moved the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the Military Academy appropriation bill, and pending that that all general debate in committee should be closed in one-half minute after the consideration of the bill was resumed.

The SPEAKER. That is the pending motion now and the Chair will put it to the House. Is there any objection to closing general debate in Committee of the Whole in one-half minute on the Military Academy appropriation bill, which will leave the bill open to amendment and five-minute debate?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and all general debate in committee has been ordered to be closed in one-half minute. The bill will be read by paragraphs for amendment, and will then be open to the five-minute debate.

The following paragraph was read:

For pay of three hundred and ten cadets at $450 each, in addition to rations, $139,500.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I offer the following amendment:

Amend by striking out "$450" and inserting "$540;" by striking out the words "in addition to rations;" and by striking out "$139,500" and inserting "$167,400;" so that it will read:

For pay of three hundred and ten cadets at $540 each, $167,400.

The effect of this amendment has been already discussed in the House. It is to strike out the $450 now in the bill and in lieu thereof to insert $540, and to strike out the rations. This would give the cadets $540, whereas up to 1867 they received $500. It is an addition to the pay up to 1867 of $40 per annum.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "$540" and substituting therefor "$600."

This will test, Mr. Chairman, the sense of the committee upon this question of reducing the pay of the cadets. The present pay, including the rations, amounts to exactly $609.50. My amendment leaves it at $600 in round numbers—so near to the present allowance that it is not worth while to make any contest over the difference.

There has been upon this question, Mr. Chairman, in the general debate more or less of discussion presenting the two sides, and there is but little that I can say now that will add to what has already been said. Whatever these cadets get in this way under the rules of the academy is all that they are entitled to receive. The academy is intended to be run as a democratic institution; of course I do not use this word in a political sense, but as meaning that all the cadets shall fare alike. It is not by the rules allowable for parents to supplement the allowance given by the Government as factitious needs and desires of the cadets may arise. But the rule that has been established is a general, fair, and munificent one, and cutting off as it does special allowances from wealthy parents and leaving the boys all upon the same level there, has been an additional reason why we should not be niggardly as to these allowances.

There are many boys there the sons of parents who if they were in colleges or other educational institutions of learning would be spending double and treble of either of the amounts now before the committee. There are other boys, the sons of poor parents, who, as the records of the academy show, are as likely to become ornaments to the Army and to the nation whose military service they will adorn, have never spent so much money. But the Government has sought, and the policy of the institution has been, to strike a fair medium and to hold all to that.

Now, this academy being run in this way, upon this moderate allowance of $600—now $609.50—I appeal to gentlemen of the committee whether there is any such call for reduction as to oblige us in the beginning of the work that is before this Congress to single out the allowances to these cadets as requiring reduction. I do not believe there is any such.

Above all, I deprecate anything that shall be looked upon as an attack upon that institution. I deprecate anything that shall be construed as the first step in the direction of an attack upon the military establishment. We are in no danger, Mr. Chairman, of a large standing army that shall oppress the people and burden it by eating up its revenue. We have already reduced the military organization. It is to-day one that is needed for the uses that arise upon our frontiers and in maintaining our rights in the broad western country. If this is the first step in the direction of an attack upon that establishment, I warn gentlemen, and I warn gentlemen especially upon the other side, that the country will not sustain any such movement.

I had proposed, Mr. Chairman, but the bill was read so fast that I did not get my copy from the file until that paragraph was passed, to move an amendment with reference to the professors. I do not know whether the gentleman in charge of the bill would object to that amendment being offered to test the sense of the committee after it has been tested on the pending amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I object to going back.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Pennsylvania of course must understand that it was the intention to offer amendments there, but the bill was read so quickly, before members could get it from their files, that there was no opportunity to offer amendments, and in fact I had to depend upon a neighbor of mine, who handed me his bill that I might offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. RANDALL. I will briefly notice the points made by the gentleman who has just taken his seat. His first point was as to the pay of the cadets. Now, sir, the amount of money appropriated here it is true appears upon its face to be appropriated to each cadet, but the fact is that none of this money goes into the pocket of the cadet except the $2 which is held sacred each month, and which at the end of four years goes to the graduating cadet, being $96, so that this appropriation is in fact an appropriation for the maintenance and support of the cadet, and we believe that the amount of $540 is sufficient for that purpose, and that there is no foundation for the attempt now being made to show that we are cutting down in the least degree any of the comforts or any of the requirements in connection with the cadets.

The next effort of the gentleman from Maine was to show that the legislation which we propose is making a distinction between poor and rich cadets, or between the boys of poor and rich parents. Well, that is a very weak resort of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RANDALL. I will not be interrupted.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not wish to be interrupted. I was saying that that is a very weak resort of the gentleman from Maine, for they have a most salutary rule there, that when boys enter that institution the rich and the poor are upon a level, and the rich man's son is not allowed in any form whatever to have any money outside of the Government allowance, so as to create a distinction between the rich and the poor.

Mr. HALE. That is precisely what I have said.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, the gentleman states that we have singled out this institution to economize upon. It is true that this bill is the first bill, and no gentleman in this House or in the Committee on Appropriations knows better than the gentleman from Maine who makes this assertion that the committee have decided upon a uniform reduction in all the departments, and that the reduction is to be 10 per cent. He knows further that we reduced the number of persons employed 20 per cent. and made their hours of labor eight hours instead of six.

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman propose to make any exceptions?

Mr. RANDALL. There are exceptions. There are wise and proper exceptions, which every law makes. The gentleman is quite aware of this fact that in the committee in this reduction we have made important exceptions. He knows that we have made an exception in the case of the salary of the Vice-President, in the salary of the Librarian of the House, and we shall continue to make exceptions wherever we think meritorious and useful officers of the Government are not overpaid. But there is an indication here that gentlemen on the other side intend to obstruct the action of the committee in making these reductions and other reform movements. I hope, sir, that this side of the House will be ready to march forward to the disposition and purpose which the people everywhere have exhibited. I declare now and here to the House and to the country that there is no danger whatever that the committee will do any injustice. Let me say that there is a marked difference between the duties of this committee and of the committee composed by the former majority in the House. There is a duty which compels us to look into each detail of appropriations, whereas heretofore the committee has been too ready to rely upon the estimates of the Departments. With a view to reduce these appropriations the committee have gone into every detail to know if we can reduce the appropriations. I hope, sir, the amendment of the gentleman from Maine will be voted down. This is not a reduction of the pay of the cadet, for he receives none of it until he graduates.

Mr. HURLBUT. In order that the House may not be misled by what I think is a careless statement made by my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to state that the salary or pay of cadets is used under the guidance of the officers there in every item.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I would inquire if the debate is not exhausted on the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are two amendments pending and that the gentleman has a right to debate the second.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my amendment to enable the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] to renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is now strictly in order without any withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. Now, sir, whatever amount we give to the cadets it is administered by the officers there as trustees and guardians of these young men. Whatever amount remains at the expiration of his term of cadetship is paid over to him when he graduates in order to give him his outfit in the Army. I stated as a fact that for the last five years under the pay of $609 expended under this careful supervision on the part of the officers there no single cadet has yet ever graduated with money enough remaining for his outfit, to give him the outfit that properly belongs to an officer of the Army.

Now, sir, I have nothing to do with the general proposition which the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has thought proper to bring into this debate. I am in favor of economy, but, sir, I do not believe in the economy which is carried to excess in this bill, and I trust therefore that the amendment increasing the amount of the pay of cadets to $600 may prevail.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman whether the difficulty he speaks of, of not having a sufficient amount left to meet the expenses of outfit, has not been quite as great since the increase of salary was made in the year 1867?

Mr. HURLBUT. Not to the same extent, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. There is one other point, sir, which I wish to make. I find that at Yale College, including room-rent, furniture, fuel, light, text-books, and other expenses, the expenses of a student at the institution are $340 a year. That of course does not embrace clothing or anything of that kind. They receive fuel, lights, and furniture, or furnished quarters. Now, if the gentleman will deduct these items from $340 per annum, the amount which seems to be required as the necessary expenses for a student at Yale College, he will see that we give to these cadets $540 a year, with fuel and lights, and our institution should be Spartan-like in its spirit of economy, so as to prepare these men for the Army life to which they are to be hereafter devoted.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is that a question or a speech?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a speech. I am speaking in the time of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. O'BRIEN,] who I know does not grudge me it.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Yes, certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only desire to say that $540 a year is not the only allowance to the cadet. He is supplied with his room, furniture, lights, and fuel; all these things are provided for him by the Government. And when you come to compare this allowance with the necessary cost for the support of a young man at one of our literary institutions, it will be found that this Government is more liberal than is deemed necessary by the managers of those institutions.

Mr. HURLBUT. In answer to the gentleman—as he is asking a question I can answer him best by stating results—I will say that under the most careful and economical supervision of these young men they have not been able in any one case to save out of their pay, after paying the extraordinary expenses which belong to the fine state of personal appearance which they are compelled to keep up at all times, enough to properly fit them out for their positions in the Army when they graduate. Why, sir, their laundry bills would astonish every man of you. They are required by the rules every day during the summer to wear white pantaloons, and to my certain knowledge it takes three pairs a day. In reality, and as a matter of fact, with the best economy that can be enforced upon these young men by their careful instructors, they do not go from the academy with savings enough to buy their outfit for the Army.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to say to my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL,] that I will join hands with him in all reasonable economy from this time until the end of the session, both in regard to this bill and other bills that may emanate from his committee. But I want him clearly to understand one thing, and that is, that it will not be policy on his part to imitate the proceedings which were inaugurated and carried on upon the other side of this House by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations during the last Congress. I refer particularly to the non-toleration of any difference of opinion.

I do not consider that economy is necessarily a party question, nor do I concede that the democratic side of the House ought to have a monopoly of it. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House may and ought to join in reasonable and judicious reduction and retrenchment. True economy may ofttimes be fostered as well as by offering amendments increasing appropriations as in diminishing them.

I have a little information in regard to the Military Academy, and it is to this effect: Whether the cadets there are allowed $500 or $600 a year, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations does not matter, as they are cared for all the same. Of this I am not informed, but I do know that the provision which is made for them is not of that character which should be made for the wards of the Government; that in their buildings, equipments, and provisions of all kinds they are not provided for in the manner in which they should be; but whether it is the fault of the amount appropriated or not I am not here to say, for I have not the information.

I do believe, however, that if you cut down these appropriations for these young men, it will not only be an incentive to, but it will be, as it were, an apology for those who have charge of this Military Academy to cut them off from many of their resources, and resources which are absolutely necessary for their dignified and honorable maintenance. I do not conceive that it would require the sum of $600 for any ordinary young man to maintain a proper position in civil life. But I can understand that from the circumstances which surround these young men at West Point, from the cost of every necessary of life and the appearance which they are obliged to make, by the requirements which military regulations impose upon them, the sum appropriated in this bill is not entirely sufficient, especially when we consider the fact that the sum which they have heretofore been allowed under appropriation bills passed by former Congresses has not given to them that provision which their position requires.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Is not debate exhausted upon the pending amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. HURLBUT. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I renew it.

Mr. RANDALL. I give notice that I shall object hereafter to any further withdrawal of the amendment.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have no disposition to occupy the time of this committee to any great extent. I do not stand here to impugn the motives of the Committee on Appropriations in making this bill assume its present shape. I shall, however, give the reasons why I shall vote for the amendment to restore the pay of the cadets to the amount which they now receive.

I have no political feeling in regard to this matter. My district has but a single cadet, and he was appointed upon a competitive examination. He does not belong to the aristocracy of money, nor does he belong to the aristocracy of intellect, which is an aristocracy I do not much believe in. He belongs to the aristocracy of industry, and by industry, though the son of a workingman, of an iron-molder, he was able to carry off this prize. And let me say further that his father is a democract. Of course I have no political feeling in regard to it. If there should be another vacancy in that district I am thankful to be able to say that there is a custom now so strong that I should not dare disregard it, but I should submit the filling of the vacancy to competitive examination, so that there would be no interest to come to my party, or to myself, or to any of my blood. It is now I think very unfortunate to propose to reduce the pay of our young men situated in this way.

I consider a cadet at West Point as truly in the service of his country now as if he were in the West guarding our frontier from the Indians. He is in actual service when he receives his appointment; he is in all human probability to continue in service as long as he lives and is able to fill his position. I think it would be a mistake to cut down these young men.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Chairman, I had the honor to be one of the visitors to this institution last year, which is my apology for saying a word on this question. It seems to me that in discussing the question how much these young men can be supported for the committee is diverted from the true issue. This is a question which touches the discipline of this institution. The instructors, the persons charged with the system of military education at West Point, desire to have the young men whose characters as officers, and gentlemen, and scientific men they are forming, disciplined in a manner which requires a certain scale of living and certain habits of life. These professors would be just as much opposed to any increase of expenditure which would depart from the austere and strict discipline that they lay down to their pupils as they would be to an unnecessary reduction. It is a most important consideration therefore that in favor of this attempt to reduce the allowance of these cadets there is not found a recommendation from any person charged with the discipline of that institution or who has been recognized by the country as an authority in such matters. And I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the committee ought not to reduce the allowance for the support of these young men unless they have first inquired of the commandant of cadets or the other instructors of that institution, and received from them a recommendation that it should be done.

Now, the whole of the present expense goes to the articles of food, of clothing, (including laundry bills and other bills of that kind,) of text-books, and of furniture. As to every one of these articles, except clothing, the expenditure is now maintained upon the most austere scale of Spartan strictness and economy. The rooms are the rooms of hermits. The food is a constant source of complaint, not merely from the young men, but from the committee of visitors that go there year after year, although the purveyor is of course on his best behavior during the fortnight the committee are there in the summer. It is impossible to reduce that expenditure.

In regard to the matter of clothing, the expenditure is of course very large. Any cadet receiving in the course of a year two hundred demerits is dropped from the class to which he belongs. Now, if the instructor at morning parade finds a bit of rust or stain, visible to the naked eye, on the white pantaloons of the cadet, twenty demerits are charged against him for that offense; and as a further punishment he is obliged to mount guard on Saturday afternoon during all the holiday hours given to the cadets during the week.

Now, the effect on the character of those young men from requiring this strict attention to neatness in dress and in arms everybody who has seen one of those graduating classes recognizes. This discipline of the martinet, as it may be called—the education of the young man during the forming period of his life to this absolute strictness of conduct in regard to almost everything, and especially in the respects I have named—is what gives the self-command, the power of enduring hardship, the character of the accomplished gentleman and officer, which distinguish all the graduates of that school.

Now, I beg gentlemen on the other side of the House to remember that they are not dealing with the question how much money a certain class of young men ought to spend in a year. They are dealing with a question which touches closely the discipline of this school, where the expenditures are already reduced to a scale of strict economy. They are undertaking to interfere with that discipline without having received or having cited opinions in favor of their action from any person charged with administering that discipline or any person in the country recognized as an authority on that subject.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon the pending amendment to the amendment is exhausted. The question will be put upon that proposition.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. Nobody has been heard in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Speeches have been made on the question.

Mr. HALE. If any gentleman on either side desires to debate the question further, I will withdraw my amendment that it may be renewed.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection has been made to the withdrawal of any amendment, and it cannot be done without unanimous consent.

The question being taken on the amendment to the amendment, it was not agreed to, there being—ayes 68, noes 96.

The question then recurred on the amendment of Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey.

Mr. COX. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I think gentlemen on the other side of the House have appeared in the position of obstructionists to fair, honest retrenchment. They commenced on this West Point bill; where will they end? If a bill is brought in on the Navy they will oppose that in detail; if on the Army, they will oppose that in detail; if on the Interior Department, they will fight that in detail; if on the Indian Department, they will likely ask for the old appropriation. Where can we begin if not here on this particularly prodigal and luxurious system at West Point? I know no place where we can begin so well.

Gentlemen say these are small retrenchments. So they are. The appropriation passed the other day for the Centennial was only three and a half cents per capita. It would only take $55 to-day to pay off the national debt. All these things are small. Economy means the law of the house, not of this House, but the law of the household. We have got to come down to details, and yet this side of the House has not the advantage which the other side has in reference to these matters, for you gentlemen are with the administration. I have an order here from General Townsend—"by order of the Secretary of War"—which says:

1. That no officer, either active or retired, shall directly or indirectly, without being called upon by proper authority, solicit, suggest, or recommend action by members of Congress for or against military affairs.

And yet the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] had the advantage of certain suggestions from these officers or professors, or, perhaps, from General Townsend himself.

Now, sir, this is a very curious order and I wish further to call the attention of the House to it. It looks a little like Cæsarism:

The foregoing is not intended to preclude officers from illustrating or expounding a measure before Congress which may have received the favor or sanction of the President, Secretary of War, or General of the Army. The experience of officers when so used is and will be viewed as valuable.

Yet, in defiance of this order, which the Secretary of War was not really authorized to make, you gentlemen on the other side have been getting from these officers valuable information which I suppose we cannot have. It is a good deal like the old law of the Turks. The Ulemas were authorized to expound the law, but if they expounded it contrary to the will of the Sultan they were pounded to death in a mortar. And that is your peculiar system of running West Point. [Laughter and applause.]

And now, Mr. Chairman, let me go a little further. From 1860 to 1864 the pay to the cadets was only $360, and from 1864 to 1867, $500. That has all been explained to you. Now they propose to put it at $540, increasing what it was in 1867. Why do you fight it? Why do you fight it in the face of the distress in the country, when you know men are going in my city from house to house begging for bread—men willing to barter their muscles and sinews for work and yet unable to make the exchange. [Applause.] Ay, even in New England, where the question is work or steal, with the preference for work if they can get work. All through the country there is this distress. But when we begin right here at West Point, every man on that side of the House stands up in phalanx against this just system of retrenchment and reform.

Mr. HOAR [in his seat] made some remark which was not heard.

Mr. COX. Please rise up and let me hear what you say. I did not hear your remark. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOAR. When the gentleman said the preference was for work in New England, I said that was the distinction between us and New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. The gentleman will please wait and hear my answer. I represent a working people—the men who build the great steamships, who make the great marine boilers for steamships, who mold things, who have learned many of the great inventions of Massachusetts—and, sir, they cannot be insulted by any small flippant remark, even by so distinguished a gentleman as the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. I wish to say to the gentleman from New York, that my colleague from the Chester district [Mr. TOWNSEND] represents the men who build American steamships, and they live upon the Delaware, and not upon the Hudson. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. That man came from my district in New York, and his place in Chester is a branch of his place in New York. He goes to Chester, I suppose, because he can build ships there cheaper in Pennsylvania, owing to some little management you have had with the Treasury and the Navy Departments, which I am not at liberty at this time to mention. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. KELLEY. The only steamers engaged in foreign trade which now fly the American flag were built in Pennsylvania and sail from Philadelphia.

Mr. COX. I admire the workingmen in Chester, the workingmen in New York, and the honest artisans in Massachusetts. I am the best friend of the workingman here, and that is the reason why I do not stand up for a magnificent West Point at the expense of the workingmen. Do you understand that? Put that in your pipe and smoke it for the next election. [Laughter and applause.] I do not think this sort of applause in order on an appropriation bill, while it will do well enough perhaps for the Centennial. [Laughter.] I do not care about it myself.

I ask simply to have this paper put in the RECORD, that members may see why it is that the gentlemen on that side object to economy. I wish the people to understand why it is that at the very beginning of our attempt to retrench expenditures in behalf of the people you men in a body fight it, every one of you.

[General Orders No. 32.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, March 15, 1873.

The practice—which has prevailed to a considerable extent—of Army officers visiting and remaining at the seat of Government during the sessions of Congress with the view of influencing legislation upon military affairs concerning the whole Army, and which have been or can be brought properly to the attention of Congress only by the President, the Secretary of War, or the General of the Army, has become a serious evil, highly detrimental to the public service and disrespectful to superior authority.

Such action on the part of Army officers not only consumes but is a task upon the time of members of Congress, causing them embarrassment and hindering necessary legislation—of which they justly complain—and injures the Army in public opinion. The advantages, if any, to the individual cannot counteract the disadvantage to the service.

It is therefore ordered—

I. That no officer, either active or retired, shall directly or indirectly, without being called upon by proper authority, solicit, suggest, or recommend action by members of Congress for or against military affairs.

The foregoing is not intended to preclude officers from illustrating or expounding a measure before Congress which may have received the favor or sanction of the President, Secretary of War, or General of the Army. The experience of officers when so used is and will be viewed as valuable.

II. All petitions to Congress by officers relative to subjects of a military character will be forwarded through the General of the Army and Secretary of War for their action and transmittal.

III. An officer visiting the seat of Government during a congressional session will upon his arrival register his name at the Adjutant-General's Office, as now required, and, in addition, address a letter to the Adjutant-General of the Army, reciting the purpose of and time that will be embraced by his visit, and the authority under which he is absent from his command or station. The purpose or object so recited will be the strict guide of the officer during his stay.

By order of the Secretary of War:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Official:

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. HALE. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to take any lessons in economy from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] I have had some experience in this House in attempting to reduce the appropriations and expenditures of the Government. The Committee on Appropriations in past years, as I endeavored to show the other day, has gone through a good deal of work in that direction. Neither I, nor the chairman, nor any member of that committee, nor any member upon this side of the House ever received any assistance in that regard from the gentleman from New York. Now he stands here to-day and points to us and to me as standing in the way of a reduction of the expenditures of the Government, and arrogates to himself and to his party the credit of first seeking to lessen the burdens of the people.

Mr. Chairman, that gentleman knows that we are to-day two months gone in this session. He knows that the main time of the session has been taken up in the introduction of bills by himself or his friends on that side of the House making new and fresh demands on the Treasury for payment. He knows that these claims coming up from the South for calls upon the Treasury in demands ranging from $10 to $60,000,000 aggregate ten times as much as the republican party has saved hitherto. He knows that there is not a man there who lost a mule by the advance of the Federal Army who does not come up here and clamor for payment from the Treasury.

Mr. ATKINS. It is your friends, your loyal friends.

Mr. HALE. He knows there is a claim of $60,000,000 to pay the cotton tax. And what I am saying is that when these claims come here and are pushed from that side of the House, the gentleman from New York will not dare to vote against them.

Mr. COX. I did vote against them.

Mr. HALE. I will submit the fact to be tested by the record. I do not care what he has done in the past.

Mr. COX. I do.

Mr. HALE. I know that he is now borne along in a current that he cannot resist, and that when these claims come up and the word is said to him by his masters he will not dare to vote against them, and that these claims will be sustained—with exceptions, it may be—on that side of the House; but I say again I do not believe he will be one of those exceptions.

Mr. Chairman, the call for economy when it proceeds in the right direction will never fail to be responded to on this side of the House. The record of the past shows that. But when we are subjected to a wash and a sea of claims that have never got through before, but are presented now in the changed political structure of the House, it is not worthy that an attack should be made upon an institution of this country that carries with it some of the best and most glorious of the memories of the Republic. I will take no lesson in economy from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. You might do so with profit. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] having already spoken once on this question, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] is recognized to offer an amendment, and the gentleman from Indiana will have an opportunity to reply.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well.

Mr. NEAL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 14 and 15, "$450" and insert "$500;" and in lines 15 and 16, strike out "$139,500," and insert "$155,000;" so that it will read:

For pay of three hundred and ten cadets, at $500 each, in addition to rations, $155,000.

Mr. NEAL. Mr. Chairman, since I came into this House, a little more than two years ago, I have been most consistent and persistent in my votes for all measures looking to a reduction of the expenditures of the Government. I have ever been and still am in favor of the most rigid economy in every branch of the public service. But while this is true I shall vote for the amendment proposed by myself, which restores the compensation of these cadets, or rather leaves it as it is at the present time, by striking out the amount proposed in the bill and inserting in lieu of it that which the law, as it now is, and as it has been for many years past, declares they shall be entitled to receive. Nor do I consider that by this vote of mine I shall be departing in the least from the economic course I have hitherto pursued, and which, for that matter, I still intend to follow. I am simply by my vote drawing a distinction between true and a false system of economy, between a system which an honest reformer, one who is in earnest in his efforts for retrenchment, ought to follow, and one which, wanting all the elements of candor and sincerity, will lead him in the footsteps of men who bring into this House measures simply for the purpose of blinding the people and acting, I was about to say, the demagogue.

I know the people whom I represent will indorse my action in this regard, for with them economy and justice go hand in hand. They are not illiberal, ungenerous, or unjust, and they will never ask that I shall be guilty of doing an act of gross injustice for the sake of saving to the Government of the United States a few thousand dollars. No, sir, such are not the people whom I represent, and I will not do violence to their feelings of benevolence and generosity, I will not stultify myself by voting upon this floor to reduce, under the mere pretext of economy, the salary or compensation of a few hundred school-boys, which is barely sufficient as it is to give them the ordinary means of subsistence.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to oppose the amendment. I have never heard, Mr. Chairman, upon the floor of the House so disingenuous a speech as that of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] never in all my experience in this House. The claims to which the gentleman refers for the purpose of justifying him in resisting the attempt at retrenchment here are the same class of claims which have been before Congress for years and years, ever since the war, as the gentleman well knows, including the $60,000,000 of cotton claims to which he refers.

Mr. HALE. Never in such numbers.

Mr. HOLMAN. To the same extent and larger. And these are many of them the same claims, the same old claims. In addition to that let me say, and I trust the gentleman from Maine will hear me, that you are making appropriations of from five to seven millions every year ever since the organization of what is known as the southern claims commission. The Court of Claims and your southern claims commission and the private bills passed have been granted from year to year on testimony. Year after year we have appropriated this money.

Mr. HALE. The cases were decided on proof.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. How many of these claims submitted to us by the good southern commission have ever been allowed except upon proof to the satisfaction of the court of the loyalty of the claimant?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are the same class of claims as those presented at the present session of Congress. Many of these claims passed the House in former sessions, but failed in the Senate.

Mr. HALE. What does the gentleman say in answer to my question? There can be no question as to the mass of these claims.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me tell the gentleman that I did not refer to the class of claims reported by the southern commission. If the gentleman will refer to the bills introduced here he will see that in a large number of them there is no attempt to prove that the claimant was loyal.

Mr. HOLMAN. These claims referred to the class of cases which are now referred to the Committee on War Claims and were formerly referred to its predecessor, the Committee on Claims; besides that I am informed that not one of these claims has been reported favorably up to this time.

Mr. HALE. Nothing has been reported to the House of much account up to this time.

Mr. DURHAM obtained the floor.

Mr. COX. I claim the right to reply to a personal remark made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in reference to myself. I move to amend by striking out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman from New York. There are two amendments pending. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. NEAL] has offered an amendment to the amendment upon which debate is exhausted.

The question was taken on Mr. NEAL'S amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. DURHAM.]

Mr. COX. That is not fair treatment after a personal attack on myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the remark of the gentleman from New York is entirely uncalled for. The Chair has been waiting for some time to recognize the gentleman from Kentucky, and he has now done so.

Mr. COX. Then I will apologize to the Chair and will take the earliest opportunity to obtain the floor.

Mr. DURHAM. I do not think there ought to be anything of politics or party in this bill at all. This institution is a national one, built up by both of the parties of the country. In discussing what is proper in reference to its management I divest myself of all that party prejudice which has been introduced in this debate by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] on the one side and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] on the other. What I desire is to do what is absolutely necessary for those cadets at West Point. Now, I am told by gentlemen who were appointed to investigate this matter that the old price, or the price paid ever since 1867, is necessary for the support of these cadets, and I am told by the then chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that $540 is sufficient. What I desire to know is what is necessary. These gentlemen differ, and I want to say here and now in my place that I am in favor of all necessary and proper retrenchment and reform. During the whole of the last session of Congress I voted all the time in that direction. And I enter my solemn protest here and now, and forever, and I never will vote to reduce legitimate and necessary expenses $1 at the bidding of my own or any other party. There are expenses and draughts upon the Treasury that ought to be cut off. But, sir, it is said that these boys who go to the Military Academy are to go there and live like servants. I undertake to say that it is not in accordance with the wishes or will of the people of the United States that such a thing shall be done. There are thousands and millions of dollars uselessly expended, and we hope that the committee will reform these abuses; but I undertake to say that public servants are worthy of their hire, and I shall never vote for a reduction of $1 beyond what I think the public service requires, and no one can drill me to do so. [Applause.] And I will say to gentlemen of my own party now that all I desire in this case is to appropriate what is really necessary for the legitimate expenses of these cadets.

Mr. ATKINS. Do you intend to assert yourself as an independent democrat?

Mr. DURHAM. I am as good a democrat as the gentleman dare claim to be, [applause,] and my record will show that I have never voted against fair and legitimate reduction of expenses. I am willing to vote to reduce the pay of these professors because I believe that it is larger than necessary. I have an institution of learning in my own town three of whose graduates are on this floor. I might say in relation to that that John C. Breckinridge, late Vice-President of the United States, was a graduate of that institution. I might mention many other honorable men who were graduates of it. There is another young and flourishing institution in my district. Their professors receive a salary of only $1,500 a year. I have thought that the recommendation of this committee to reduce the salaries of the professors at West Point to $3,500 and $4,500 a year was fair and legitimate, but I must say that I am doubtful whether you can fairly reduce the provisions for these cadets to $540 a year. If that cannot be done, then I say we ought not to reduce their pay and allowances below what is right and proper to enable them to live like gentlemen, and not like servants.

Mr. COX. I do not rise so much to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] or his argument as to answer what fell from the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.] The gentleman from Maine was offensive, simply offensive, when he spoke of my master; for he cannot find anything in my record or my votes either for retrenchment or prodigality to justify him in saying that I have any master except the people, my constituents. What did you mean by my master? On what meat have you fed that you have grown so great as to talk that way to me?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman want me to answer that question?

Mr. COX. Yes, and promptly.

Mr. HALE. I mean the leading dominating influences in the party of which the gentleman is an active and honored member—influences which he will be bound to follow, and, so far as I may use the words without intending to be offensive, to obey.

Mr. COX. That belongs to the future. You have been known in the last three or four Congresses as "BLAINE'S little bub." [Laughter.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HALE. I will put that against the buzzing fly that was "shooed" out of reputation and fame by the late member from Massachusetts. [Laughter, and raps to order by the Chairman.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] to order.

Mr. COX. Why did you allow him to put me in that predicament?

Mr. HALE. I do not call the gentleman to order. I hope he will be allowed to go on, and that I may then be allowed to reply.

Mr. GARFIELD. I call the gentleman to order, and insist upon the words being taken down.

Mr. COX. I withdraw them.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist upon their being taken down first.

Mr. COX. I withdraw them; it is not worth while to take them down.

Mr. HALE. I am willing to put "shoo-fly" against that.

Mr. COX. That is a small business, only copying an old joke.

The CHAIRMAN. The business of the committee will not be allowed to proceed until order is restored. [After a pause.] The gentleman from New York having withdrawn the remark supposed to be offensive, does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] insist on his point of order?

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not.

Mr. COX. I was tempted to use the remark only by the very indiscreet and unparliamentary language of the gentleman from Maine. He has no right to impute to me any servility to any party. I was here in Congress before he was ever heard of. I was not the servant of the South; I was a Douglas man early, and through the war I stood by the Government. I came here to do the work of my people at home, the working-people.

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. COX. Do not interrupt me; I see you are up. The gentleman from Maine undertook to read me a lecture about my record. It was mostly vaticination, what would be. Now, he has no right to indulge in any remark about that. I did not vote for the southern claims to which he has referred; I did not vote for the centennial bill. Did he vote for it?

Mr. HALE. I did, and I had good reasons for voting for it.

Mr. COX. Yes, you voted for it at this session; but last year you voted against it, and gave reasons for that vote. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. HALE. I had good reasons for both votes.

Mr. COX. Sit down; do not interrupt me. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will suspend his remarks. The Chair feels it his duty to say, and to say it emphatically, that in a dignified body as the House of Representatives ought to be this constant clapping of hands and cheering are entirely unbecoming. The Chair will again appeal to the good sense and judgment of members and to the common decencies and civilities of honorable bodies like this, and ask members to refrain from such practices hereafter. If those occupying seats in the gallery shall attempt it, the Chair will at once order the galleries to be cleared. The Chair, however, cannot preserve order upon the floor of the House unless those occupying seats upon the floor shall themselves maintain order. The gentleman from New York will now proceed.

Mr. COX. I am entirely satisfied with your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and I suggested a while ago that we should have none of this applause—except upon the Centennial. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I undertook to say a moment ago that the gentleman from Maine who read us lessons here about economy last session, and especially read lessons to his colleague, [Mr. FRYE,] who favored that Centennial appropriation bill last year, is not the kind of a man to call my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] or my friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to account for any attempt on their part to retrench expenditures. I will give the reason in his own language from the RECORD of last session. In the debate on the Centennial bill, May, 1874, he said:

I rise, sir, to oppose this appropriation. I do it for two general reasons, or rather two things urge me and move me in this direction. In the first place, I look at the condition of the country, the financial situation we are now confronting face to face. I behold a depleted Treasury.

Afterward the gentleman says:

I behold, as every man must, a session of Congress in which a large part of the best ability of both Houses concedes that wherever it is practicable to stop the expenditure of money it should be done.

Why has the gentleman reversed his peculiar economic thought for this special time and occasion? Why does he go back on his remarks upon the bill relating to the Centennial? He has changed from one side to the other. He is not the man to read lectures to us on economy. I only make the ad hominem argument on him. I have no personal feeling about him. He is nothing to me, and I am, I suppose, nothing to him in this debate. What I wish to call attention to is this: When the democratic side of the House, after a hard struggle, have got into power, after the scoundrelism, the swindling, the prodigality practiced for many years—never straight, always crooked—on your side of the House and on the part of the administration, a prodigality beyond all precedent, and when we come here with this little bill in regard to the West Point Academy in which we propose that the expenditure in certain respects shall not be beyond what it was in 1867 or 1864, we have a whole chorus of republican economists eating their own words, going back on their own record. In the name of the people, in the name of honest men everywhere, I protest in one word against the whole body of that side of the House as wanting in square, fair economy.

All your platforms favor retrenchment; you voted for it in your State conventions, though you have got sick of it perhaps. All our national platforms of both parties have favored retrenchment. The people are demanding it everywhere. Yet on the very first opportunity when there is a fair, honest, square bill brought in here, that cuts down a few cadets who are living luxuriously at West Point, the whole body of republicans here fly in the face of their own platforms and their own previous records.

The question being taken on the pro forma amendment to strike out the last word, it was not agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last two words. Sir, it is with more than usual feelings of regret that I find the attempt made here to impart a partisan character to every question of retrenchment or reform which may be introduced into this House. Gentlemen here may differ and honestly differ about the propriety of cutting down the appropriation for cadets at West Point. The cadet is the representative, as we are, of every district in the United States, congressional and delegate. The cadet is the only man in this Government who is selected from all classes of people. It has been the pride and glory of those who have sustained the Military Academy at West Point that in this Government there was one place—and it is the only one—where the child of poverty and of toil could enter the halls of learning the equal of the proudest and the wealthiest in the land. In those halls the pathway to learning, to honor, to usefulness, to fame, has been opened and kept open to the poor and the rich alike. Now, any retrenchment that will prevent the poor boy from going to that academy and standing the equal of the rich, or which will compel him to leave and go to his home, will now and ever meet with my opposition.

My record, I venture to say, has been uniformly in favor of retrenchment wherever it might be judiciously made throughout all the expenditures of the Government. But whenever there happens to be a difference of opinion between gentlemen on this side and on that, which does not happen to be the case now alone, I do not like that my learned and witty friend from New York [Mr. COX] should raise a partisan question every time. Why, sir, during the seven years that I have served in this Congress the gentleman from New York has never missed an opportunity to ring forth his clarion voice of condemnation of the party to which I belong and to make political capital whenever he could.

I do not know but we must return to the Darwinian theory after all, and must assume that such peculiarities in mind come from their originals. I have thought perhaps that old Judean ancestor, that crowed thrice before Peter could repent of his sins, had handed down his peculiarities to his descendants here on this floor. [Laughter.] But gentlemen should not mistake and think it was the crowing of one of those Judean birds which made Peter tremble and repent. It was not that insignificant noise that made the great apostle ashamed of wandering away and following his Lord so far off, nor will it prevent men in this House from following their cool, calm judgment upon any measure which is presented here. The gentlemen should remember that it was only when the calm, clear eye of "Him who spake as never man spake" turned upon that wandering disciple that he "went out and wept bitterly." But it was not the clarion voice of the bird of Judea any more than it will be of the bird of this day that will make us change our judgment because our action is attributed to partisan feelings. The calm eye of the people will reprove our errors and will approve our judgments.

Mr. GARFIELD obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to give notice that after the gentleman from Ohio has concluded his speech I will move the committee rise for the purpose of closing all debate on the pending paragraph.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I am about to say in the outset what may not be altogether a wise remark to make in a party sense, but I believe the party now in power here can make some reduction which perhaps an administration party could not make, and we ought to help them make those reductions which if we were in power we could not make. I am willing to help in every possible way to make all reasonable reduction in the expenditures of the Government.

But, sir, the remark which has been thrown out this morning that this side proposes to oppose and obstruct retrenchment is not founded in justice, not founded in anything which has happened, and will not find any foundation in anything which will happen. But while I say that for myself, and I believe I say it for most of my associates here, we are not willing to cripple any necessary function of the Government service; least of all are we willing to commence by putting out the eyes of an educational institution and crippling all of the most delicate parts of its machinery.

The bill we are now considering has been for four years under the charge of as good a democrat as ever sat upon this floor. It has never passed without his thorough consent and sanction. For four years it has been reduced below the estimates of the Department—just as low as he and his ten associates on the committee thought it could safely be done. This year it comes in with a proposed reduction of $108,000, below what it was at the lowest for four years. That $108,000 is proposed to be made on sixty-three items ranging from $10 up to $30,000. Many are wisely reduced and I defend them; but the bulk of the $108,000—namely, $87,000 of it—is made up of six items. Notice what they are. We have for several years been building a hospital for sick cadets, which was found to be necessary for the health and safety of the young men being educated there. That hospital is about half done. We put $30,000 on it last year, and $42,000 is asked this year to complete it. The Committee on Appropriations reports the bill leaving it all off. I understand them to say, however, that they intend to consider the matter hereafter.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and I will say to the gentleman that the committee propose to report all appropriations for public buildings in one bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to show how the $108,000 of reduction is made up. Suppose they put the $30,000 on, it will still leave $78,000 reduction. That $78,000 is made up of five principal items. What are they? In the first place they have thrown out $3,000 for sewerage for sanitary purposes. That I take it is unwise. I think any business man would say when a great institution like this at West Point tells us they need that sum for sanitary purposes it ought not to be stricken out.

They strike out $14,800 for the band. We have in years past put down every band in the United States except one, and it was thought that in our only institution where our young men are taught military drill and discipline they ought at least to have the cultivating influence and necessary assistance of a band.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me interrupt the gentleman to say that we have only taken out the band which was established last year. That institution has continued a long time without that band.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was put on the bill on motion of a democratic member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and was urged by him with great force as being necessary. He himself was a graduate of West Point.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. It was put on the deficiency bill during the last hours of the session.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was added on a report from the Committee on Military Affairs by Mr. YOUNG, of Georgia.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not appear in the appropriation bill which came from your committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not. It was put on as I have stated.

Mr. RANDALL. Then you must not complain if we follow your lead.

Mr. GARFIFLD. Twelve thousand seven hundred dollars are cut off the pay of professors and superintendents, $10,500 for necessary repairs of the post, and $15,500 on the cadets themselves. What are the facts? The special point before us is this: Shall the three hundred and ten young men who are now being educated at West Point have their allowance cut down in the total $15,000? That is the whole question which at this moment is pending before the committee.

I hold, Mr. Chairman, that to cut that out is simply to cripple and cramp to a most distressing degree and limit the convenience of these three hundred and ten young men.

Mr. DE BOLT. Is that Military Academy at West Point more efficient under the present rate of pay than it was in 1867 when it was less?

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman. The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who is entirely consistent, for he has preached these things for many years, has called attention to the fact that he goes back to 1867. I remind the gentleman that in 1867 the evil had become so great and so trying that from all quarters came a demand to relieve the distress of those students by giving them a little increase of allowance, and it was given. I can speak on this point from my own experience. Twenty-two years ago I was in a college where the utmost economy of living could not enable a young man to go through short of $450 a year; and at that same college which I visited a few years ago, I inquired of its faculty what it now costs for a young man to live as well and no better as we lived in my time, and they informed me that not less than $1,000 would make the same provision for the student to-day as was made for him before the war.

Now, I tell you the saddest fact that I know of in the history of education in this country in connection with our financial position is this: that the time is now almost upon us when a young man empty-handed, without money, and without friends can scarcely by any possibility make his way unaided through the colleges of the country. And here it is proposed to cut off $69 apiece from the very small margin of allowance given to these young men, many of whom are widows' sons and none of whom are able, when they get through, if they are in the cavalry service, to buy out of their allowances uniforms to their backs.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. LAMAR. Will the gentleman before insisting upon that motion yield to me for a few minutes?

Mr. RANDALL. I will give the gentleman a chance by modifying my motion in the House so that all debate on the pending paragraph shall close in ten minutes. Or, without calling upon the committee to rise, I ask unanimous consent that in ten minutes debate close on this paragraph and the amendments thereto..

Mr. HALE. The gentleman refers to the pending paragraph?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; and I do not propose to cut off, after the two amendments to this paragraph already pending, any other amendments that may be offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will observe that the Committee of the Whole has no power to close debate.

Mr. RANDALL. It may be done by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair then submits the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto shall close in ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LAMAR. I move pro forma to strike out the last three words of the amendment. My object is simply to reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] in relation to the amount necessary to support a student at an American college. I am not of the opinion that the allowance recommended by the committee is a niggardly one. I am more familiar with the subject perhaps than he is himself, having been connected for a time officially with a university. Now, sir, it is very probable that these large amounts are necessary, according to the standard of living which has been fashionable of late at the northern institutions of education. But that standard, sir, is one of extravagance. I have known young men in the University of Mississippi pay for their tuiton and their board, and get through with $350, and win their spurs as first-honor men besides, and live respectably and visit in the best society.

Mr. GARFIELD. Including their clothing, too?

Mr. LAMAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. When was that?

Mr. LAMAR. Two years ago I paid my own son's expenses at a college near Baltimore, which by a very small amount exceeded $500.

Mr. SINGLETON. Will my colleague allow me a moment to make a remark?

Mr. LAMAR. Certainly.

Mr. SINGLETON. I wish to say this: If you add to the $540 which the Committee on Appropriations propose to give these cadets $10 a month for the use of a room furnished to their hands, and then $25 for fuel and $20 for lights, you will find that the whole amounts to $705, which in four years amounts to almost $3,000 which is given as a gratuity to these young men that they may be educated there at the public expense. Now, I ask how many parents are there who are able to spend $705 a year for a son's education? It is proposed to give $3,000 for each of these young men, and yet gentlemen on that side are talking about our being niggardly in this grant. I say we are not niggardly, but liberal, and ought not to pay more than the committee propose. I should have mentioned that they get medical attendance also.

Mr. LAMAR. I thank my colleague for his statement, which I think proves conclusively that this is not an ungenerous allowance. If gentlemen could convince me of it, if they could point out to me in any way that the young gentlemen who are at the national Military Academy are stinted in the slightest degree, or embarrassed or obstructed in the prosecution of their studies, I would vote for $600. But I am satisfied, Mr. Chairman, that this is not a niggardly allowance, to say the least of it. If, sir, it should curtail some of the luxuries of the young gentlemen there, I do not know but that it will be a good lesson at this time to impress upon any body of young men the importance and value of self-denial and habits of economy. If I could be convinced that there was one dollar less in this appropriation than was necessary to provide these young gentlemen with comforts adequate to their proper maintenance, which I think ought to be amply sufficient, I would vote against the recommendation of the committee. But of that I am not convinced.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX,] whose letters upon both sides of the same subject are floating about the country, has accused me of inconsistency in voting for the centennial appropriation.

Mr. COX. That remark of the gentleman is not true. You have got no such letters, and you cannot find them.

Mr. HALE. I refer to what appeared in the public prints. But the charge is made against me of inconsistency. I opposed the passage of the centennial appropriation when it was here two years ago because it came upon us in a demand for $3,000,000 with no capital raised elsewhere of any account and having been invested, because I believed that if the Government committed itself to that appropriation it was the entering-wedge to an appropriation for $15,000,000. I have no regret, sir, to utter for that vote. I believed if the Government had appropriated the amount asked for at that time a reign of extravagance would have set in, that it would have been a badly-managed affair, and that to-day, instead of the people of the country feeling an interest in it, a prejudice against it would have repulsed it at this time. Sir, after the failure of that measure the managers set themselves faithfully to good management; they raised money; they built beautiful buildings; and then they came to us for $1,500,000, willing to give a receipt in full; and I was glad to compromise upon it and commit the Government to that extent all the more because I had never entertained any constitutional objections to the measure. I am rather a strict constructionist myself, and I believed there was as much authority for this appropriation as for many other appropriations which have been passed by Congress. I therefore voted for the last appropriation; and as I have no regrets to utter as to my first vote, I have none as to my second. I do not believe they will come here again for a dollar; and there was nothing in my vote or action upon that centennial measure that is inconsistent with my former course. I would not, sir, have troubled the House, as I did not in the discussion of that bill, deeming my vote of too little interest to any one, if this matter had not been thrown in my face by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Now, personally, let me say that I have been in the House eight years, and I have never had upon this floor what may be termed an unpleasant personal controversy with any member either upon this side of the House or the other. My relations with my fellow-members have always been pleasant; but now, in this discussion in the House, becoming not personal but strong and exciting, there was language used which should only be made use of in places far below this. When such language is a criticism upon me, I am that sort of a man that I should be apt to retort in language equally unparliamentary, which in the presence of the House I regret.

Mr. COX. I beg to say one word only. The gentleman from Maine began this personality by indicating that I had masters over me on this floor. Sir, you should regret that. I should never have responded to you except for that.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment in lines 14, 15, and 16, to strike out $450 and insert in lieu thereof $540, and to strike out in the section $139,500 and insert in lieu thereof $167,400.

Mr. WHITE. Is that amendment open to amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. Amendments are in order, but no debate.

Mr. WHITE. I do not desire to debate it, but I offer this amendment. Strike out lines 14, 15, and 16, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The pay of two hundred and ten cadets at $540 each, in addition to rations, $113,400.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The amendment was then adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of three hundred and ten cadets, at $450 each, in addition to rations, $139,500.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out "ten" and inserting "fifteen."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to strike out that clause. I do not think that sixteen enlisted men should be paid for as musicians.

Mr. RANDALL. I find by the Revised Statutes that sixteen men have usually been provided for, and last year for the first time the Government of the United States assumed the payment of another band of forty musicians. It was not in the estimates of last year and it was not in the regular appropriation bill last year; it was inserted in the deficiency bill. It is an expense which until last year was never devolved upon the Government, but it amounts in all to $148,000. That was the reason the committee struck out that appropriation.

The question was taken on Mr. HURLBUT's amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of explaining what this appropriation, as proposed in this paragraph, amounts to, "For sixteen musicians for companies, $2,496." That would bring the pay of each musician down to $13 a month. Now, every gentleman who knows anything about the matter knows that it is utterly impossible to get musicians at any such rate of compensation. The appropriation as it stands in this bill, copied from an old appropriation bill, is simply for a drum corps of enlisted men. Gentlemen may abolish the band at West Point, which they will do by this paragraph, if they choose to take the responsibility of so doing. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read the following:

Provided, and it is hereby declared and enacted, That the pay herein allowed and given shall be in full of all other pay, allowance, forage, rations, or commutation, except for quarters, fuel, and light; and that the pay for other professors, instructors, and assistants, being officers of the Army when detailed and assigned to service at the Military Academy, shall be only their Army pay, without increase for term of service and without allowance for forage, rations, or commutation, except for quarters, fuel, and light; and that sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are, repealed; and that all other acts and parts of acts in conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to amend the paragraph just read so that it will read as follows:

Provided, and it is hereby declared and enacted, That the pay herein allowed and given shall be in full of all other pay or other allowance, except for quarters, forage, fuel, and light; and that the pay for assistant professors, instructors, and assistants, being officers of the Army when detailed and assigned to service at the Military Academy, shall be only their Army pay, without additional pay or other allowance by reason of service at the Military Academy, except for quarters, forage, fuel, and light, &c.

Mr. BANNING. I move to strike out the entire paragraph, and I hope the Committee on Appropriations will accept my motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Let us hear your reasons.

Mr. BANNING. It relates to the longevity allowance to officers of the Army, or additional pay for terms of years of service.

Mr. RANDALL. My amendment reaches that.

Mr. HURLBUT. It does not.

Mr. BANNING. It does not cover it.

Mr. HURLBUT. State the effect of your motion to strike out.

Mr. BANNING. The effect of my motion to strike out this proviso, if adopted, will be to leave the matter in the hands of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I will withdraw my amendment.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. BANNING to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] to modify his motion so as to strike out only the first and last clauses of the paragraph, and leave it to read as follows:

Provided, That sections 9 and 10 of the act approved March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiences in the appropriations for fiscal years ending June 30, 1875, and prior years, and for other purposes," be, and the same are, repealed.

That will repeal so much of the deficiency bill of last session as created this band at West Point, and required an appropriation of $14,600.

Mr. HURLBUT. What are those sections 9 and 10 of the act of March 3, 1875?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have them before me; they are as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Military Academy band shall consist of one teacher of music, who shall be leader of the band, and may be a civilian, and of forty enlisted musicians of the band.

SEC. 10. That the teacher of music shall receive $90 per month, one ration, and the allowance of fuel of a second lieutenant of the Army; and that of the enlisted musicians of the band, ten shall each be paid $34 per month, and the remaining thirty shall each be paid $30 per month; and that the enlisted musicians of the band shall have the benefits as to pay, arising from re-enlistments and length of service, applicable to other enlisted men of the Army.

I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] to accept that modification of his motion.

Mr. HURLBUT. Better not; we must have a band there.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I move to amend the paragraph as I have indicated, pending the motion to strike out.

Mr. BANNING. The band is provided for by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. And we want to repeal that law.

Mr. BANNING. I will accept the amendment upon the understanding that it affects nothing but the band.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to add to the paragraph as amended the following:

For additional pay to professors for length of service, as provided by section 1336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, the same to be distributed under the provisions of said section, $6,800.

As I understand that by the paragraph as amended on motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] this question of longevity pay is left to the future action of the Committee on Military Affairs, I propose by my amendment to leave the longevity pay of the professors in the same way. I do not propose to discuss my amendment; I will only ask a vote upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the amendment will be voted down.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 358) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Lemington, New Jersey.

SESSION OF TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the session of to-morrow will be for debate only in the House as in Committee of the Whole, no other business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. EDEN, will preside.

DEATH OF HON HENRY H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. BARNUM. I rise to announce the death in this city this morning of my late colleague from the third congressional district of the State of Connecticut, Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, and to offer the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows;

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker of the House to take order for superintending the funeral of Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER, late a member of this body from the State of Connecticut.

Resolved, That as a mark of the respect entertained by the House for the memory of Hon. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER his remains be removed to Norwich, Connecticut, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by the said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER, in pursuance of the first resolution, announced the appointment of the following committee: Mr. BARNUM, Mr. GARFIELD, Mr. WHEELER, Mr. PHELPS, Mr. HOAR, Mr. LANDERS of Connecticut, and Mr. ASHE.

And thereupon (at three o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House, in accordance with the concluding resolution just adopted, adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of Frederick M. Blount, clerk in the office of the assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois, for relief, on account of his having taken a counterfeit $500 note, believing it to be genuine, while acting as such clerk, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CUTLER: The petition of the Second Presbyterian church of Newark, New Jersey, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. DAVY: The petition of citizens of New York, for a public building at Rochester, New York, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GOODIN: The petition of Charles Gibson and 180 other settlers of the "Black Rob" lands in Kansas, for the passage of House bill No. 640 now pending before Congress, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HATCHER: Memorial of the governor and acting quartermaster-general of Missouri, in regard to the claim of that State against the United States for supplies furnished and property taken by the United States Army, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HENDEE: The petition of Hon. George Wilkins and 167 other citizens of Stowe, Vermont, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOPKINS: The petition of citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, for re-imbursement of expenditures to prevent damage by reason of the erection of the Parkersburgh bridge upon the navigation of the Ohio River, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. JENKS: The petition of Mrs. Martha M. B. McCullough, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of W. B. Harlan, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. McFARLAND: The petition of Mary Conley, formerly Mary Murrell, to have the name of R. H. Murrell placed upon the rolls of the Tenth Tennessee Cavalry as commissary-sergeant, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MONROE: The petition of S. L. Wadsworth and other citizens of Auburn, Ohio, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: The petition of John S. Harper, for officers and crews of United States gunboats Kineo and Chocura, for prize-money on forty-nine bales cotton, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. PAYNE: The petition of Mrs. Julia S. W. Evans, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHELPS: The petition of Joseph D. Packwood, for property destroyed during the revolutionary war and for extraordinary service then rendered the Government, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. POPPLETON: The petitions of citizens of Knox and Holmes Counties, Ohio, for a post-route from Gann to the town of Greenville, Ohio, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. RANDALL: The petition of Edward Brady, for the issuance of letters-patent to him for an improvement in safety-valves for steam-boilers, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petitions of the First Congregational church of Williamstown, Massachusetts; of the Bay View Methodist church of Gloucester, Massachusetts; of the Congregational church of Paxton, Massachusetts; of the Temperance Brotherhood of Christian churches of Brooklyn, New York; representing fifty-five churches and an aggregate membership of 30,000 persons, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. STRAIT: The petition of Charles Timmons, for compensation while a prisoner of war, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of Isaac Riseden, for pay for services as a United States Army officer, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of John Maloy, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WALDRON: The petition of Lieutenant Henry Romeyn, for a change in the date of his commission, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WALKER, of Virginia: Memorial of the Richmond Chamber of Commerce, relating to the Texas Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. WILLARD: Memorial of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, mostly bankers, in behalf of Dana Bickford's plan of international coinage, to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Also, memorial of the governor of North Carolina, the mayor of Raleigh, North Carolina, and other citizens of that State, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of Adaline C. Wilcoxson, for an extension of time within which to file claims for bounty, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 29, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m., and was called to order by Mr. EDEN as Speaker pro tempore. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House meets to-day as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for debate only, no other business to be transacted. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is it not necessary that the Journal of yesterday be read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair that would be the transaction of business.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair is clearly right. If the Journal were now read it could not be corrected or approved, because such action would be the transaction of business, and would be in violation of the agreement adopted yesterday. The Journal will be read at the next meeting, and then there will be an opportunity for its correction, if there is anything wrong in it. Many members now absent may be interested in seeing that the Journal is correct.

Mr. PAGE. My impression is that it has always been usual at such sessions as these to read the Journal of the preceding day.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the Journal is ready to be read.

Mr. PAGE. I have no doubt of that.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. LAMAR. I desire to correct a report in the RECORD of my remarks the other day on the centennial bill. I am reported, and no doubt correctly, for these gentlemen at the desk generally take down my words very exactly, as having said that in respect of our foreign affairs the States or people had divested themselves of their entire sovereignty and delegated it to the Federal Government. I intended to say, and thought I did say, that they delegated to that Government the authority to exercise all the powers of sovereignty. I do not wish to be understood as saying that the sovereignty inherent in a society or a State or a people can be delegated or pledged away. I think the context shows that I meant this, but I desire to make the correction in the interests of accurate thinking.

RESUMPTION OF SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. SCHLEICHER Mr. Speaker, it would have best accorded with my personal preferences to have found in the House the sign of a well-defined financial policy, which would agree with my general convictions of what the country needs and demands, and to have followed a lead in that direction. But it seems to me that our path for the future in that respect is still in the dark, lighted only by eternal truth and the teachings of experience. I have come to the conclusion that my duty, like that of every Representative in a time like this, is an earnest, devoted adherence to truth and honesty, and complete and unreserved loyalty to the convictions of right, which I have formed from the lights before me. No good, at this time, can come from the politician's reasoning to find out the drift of popular will, and take the course which seems to lead to the people's favor. Public opinion itself is not formed, and the course which might to-day seem to lead to popular approval may to-morrow be found to lead away from it. No time-serving views will now answer. A firm determination to do right, to follow a conviction arrived at, after earnest and laborious searching, cannot be wrong. The people mean to be honest and right; this is the fundamental idea of my political faith. They will appreciate the right when they see it. Upon the whole, I do not know but that the rough maxim of Crockett, one of the first heroic victims who fell for Texan independence from Mexico, will outweigh all the subtle diplomatic calculations of politics: "Be sure you are right, then go ahead."

NATIONAL DEBT.

The national debt is a severe burden upon our people. It is a heavier burden than the national debts of such nations as the English or the French are to them. For theirs are debts owed at home, owed by the nation to its own citizens. The total wealth of a nation is not affected by such a debt; it neither adds to it nor detracts from it. The bondholders are tax-payers. The interest, which is the real, ever recurring annual burden, goes to the citizens, remains in the country, and counts in the aggregate of the people's revenues, as well as in the aggregate of the expenditures. These are the redeeming features of a home debt. It is different with a debt owed abroad. There the interest upon the national debt is a periodical drain upon the resources of the nation which must be made good by the labor and the productions of the people. It is a periodical outflow of so much capital from the debtor country, without any redeeming feature, an expense absorbing the fruits of the people's labor to the extent of its amount.

Of the funded debt of the United States, more than half is owed abroad, and, as the annual interest is somewhat over $100,000,000, the annual outflow of money from the country, uncompensated and totally lost to the people, is now more than fifty millions. The remaining portion is held at the North, and to that extent the Northern States enjoy the redeeming features of a home debt. Nearly one-half of the annual interest paid by the nation is received and enjoyed by the Northern States. This and the fact that large fortunes were accumulated and the industry of the Northern States was stimulated and sustained during the war are some of the compensating features of the debt at the North.

THE SOUTH.

We have none such at the South. We are debtors only. Our relation to the public debt is only the relation of the tax-payer. Struggling into new life from the ruin and prostration which were our lot after the late civil war and its subsequent troubles, we find ourselves called upon by duty to take up our part of the burdens of the public debt without any of its mitigating features.

Representing, in part, a Southern State, it is natural therefore that I should view this great question from the stand-point of the tax-payer. In my district there are few bondholders. Few, if any, have any possible relation to the public debt, more than to bear their share of the burden. If therefore my judgment should be under any bias, it certainly cannot be in the interest of the capitalist, the money speculator, or bondholder. My special duty to my constituents impels me, and all my inclinations lead me, to advocate and adopt the side of the large body of tax-payers.

HONOR AND INTEREST ALIKE.

The honor of our country is intrusted to every citizen. Far be it from me to intimate that it is not dear to our people, or that we would not make a sacrifice of our interest, when necessity demands it, for its sake. But I am convinced, and I propose to show, that no such sacrifice is required, that our honor and interest both point out our path in the same direction, and that in upholding the one we shall best subserve the other.

As to the principal of the debt, our only course is to deal with it honestly as best we may. But the interest is not an unchangeable amount, it is the real annual burden on the tax-payer, and it is in our power to greatly diminish it by proper action.

The credit of a nation is the confidence which the public opinion of the world entertains that it will comply with all its engagements and promises. That confidence rests upon the belief, first, in its ability to comply with its engagements; and second, upon the belief in its good faith and earnest will to do so. In all cases where the ability is unquestioned, credit rests solely upon the faith of the world in the strict integrity, truth, and honor of the nation, and the degree of such faith and confidence regulates the money value of its obligations. That value is expressed not only by the price of the obligations in the market of the world, but also by the higher or lower interest at which the nation can place its obligations. Thus, low interest on a national debt is the reward earned by the nation by pure, unhesitating, and unvarying honor and honesty; while higher interest is a penalty paid by a nation for every deviation from the strictest integrity in complying with its promises.

LOW INTEREST.

The true economy and wisdom which lies in unswerving honesty ought, therefore, to be clear to all. Every individual tax-payer is directly interested in placing the honor and credit of his nation on the very highest point in the world's estimation, for, as the nation's credit rises, so, by prudent management, the interest, which is the immediate periodical burden, will become easier. The national debt of England bears 3 per cent.; our own funded debt bears 6 per cent. on two-thirds and 5 per cent on one-third of the amount. If by prudent economy and spotless integrity we should raise our credit to the standard of English credit, the annual saving for our tax-payers would be on the amount of about seventeen hundred millions of our bonds, $46,000,000, nearly one-half of the entire interest. This shows the tangible and material value of our national honor to every citizen. Such a result may not be at once attainable, but let the friends of retrenchment turn their attention in this direction and recognize the fact that every approximation to this "consummation so devoutly to be wished" will be the most efficient retrenchment of our expenses. Already has the fair dealing, as far as our bonds are concerned, raised our credit so that five hundred millions of 6 per cent. bonds have been replaced by 5 per cent. bonds; thus far an annual saving of five millions well earned and pointing the way to further reductions.

The question naturally arises, in what particular has our policy as regards our national finances fallen short of that high standard necessary to place our credit on an equality with the best? And here we are face to face with the question of our national currency, or greenbacks, for they constitute the dark spot on an otherwise bright escutcheon.

GREENBACKS.

The greenbacks, or legal-tenders, that portion of our public debt which bears no interest, amount, in round numbers to three hundred and seventy-five millions. Upon its face, every one of these notes bears this inscription:

The United States will pay to bearer (ten) dollars.

This is a fruitful text to argue from and contains in fact the whole question in a nut-shell. First, it proves that, in the opinion of the Congress making these papers, they were not money.

In 1862, when these papers were first issued, a promissory note to pay a certain number of dollars had a definite meaning. It meant that gold or silver, the only dollar then known, was to be paid. By the act of March 18, 1869, Congress, re-affirming what was the obligation before, declares:

The United States solemnly pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

Is it not a strange fact that, in 1876, Congress should still consider it a matter of discussion whether this pledge made in 1862, re-iterated solemnly in 1869, should be kept or not; whether these notes should be paid, as promised and re-promised, in coin or not? Has not the corrupting poison of this broken promise already blunted our moral perceptions?

The United States will pay the bearer (ten) dollars.

It does not say when, it only acknowledges the debt and the obligation to pay it. In ordinary life, and between individuals, this would be a note payable on demand, and a court would so enforce it. As coming from the Government, the holder has no legal remedy against the debtor; he cannot enforce the payment by law. How would common honesty then decide it? During the war no one could expect the Government to redeem these promises, as it was engaged in a struggle for its existence. Since the end of the war and the return of ordinary prosperity, honesty would have dictated that the redemption should have commenced, to use the phraseology of the act of 1869, "at the earliest practicable period."

That the nation was exempt from compulsory legal process could not have been an argument for delay. No statesman who has the honor of his country at heart, and understands the close connection of national honor, national credit, and national prosperity, would give expression to such an argument without a blush. That the currency part of the debt should be used as a contrivance to obtain a continued loan, without interest, from our people, forced by the legal-tender act to take it, a permanent forced loan, and thereby save the reasonable interest on its amount, would be an argument equally mean and dishonorable, and, moreover, as I propose to show, as erroneous and deceptive in its results as it is contemptible in its intent.

No reason, therefore, existed why, in compliance with all these promises and pledges, the redemption of these long-dishonored promises to pay should not have been taken up "at the earliest practicable period."

To any careful reader of the act of May 18, 1869, it would seem that a manner of redeeming these greenback notes, by paying them in coin, was indicated with sufficient clearness to be seen by a willing eye. The first section of that act reads as follows:

SEC. 3693. * * * But none of the interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes are convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin.

According to this act the plain rule would be that the surplus gold which might collect in the Treasury from custom receipts, over and above the interest on bonds, should be first exclusively used in the redemption of the legal-tender notes, the only manner of making them convertible into gold, and after that was accomplished only bonds, not matured, should be bought.

Instead of that, the Government, entirely disregarding the act, employed the surplus gold, sufficient, with the help of a small sale of bonds, to redeem the whole volume of three hundred and eighty millions of legal-tenders to purchase bonds many years before their maturity. The ostensible motive was the saving of interest. As an act of saving it was penny-wise and pound-foolish, as I will show; while it made the evils of our currency permanent, and kept our credit depreciated when it would have been improved, if the legitimate task, the payment of the debt past due, had first been accomplished. It was an act of bad faith and as such carried with it the penalty of bad faith, an impaired credit.

From the financial report of 1874, I take the total purchases of bonds from May, 1869, when the above law passed, to 30th of September, 1874, at the face value of $323,353,800.

I take the value including purchases for the sinking fund, because I am perfectly convinced that the purchases for the sinking fund were also subject to the conditions of the first article of the law of 1869. It would lead me too far to go further into this argument at this moment.

It is sufficient to say that it was in the power of the Government to have paid this non-interest-bearing portion of our debt to close the period of the corruption of our entire financial system by irredeemable currency, but that it was preferred instead to buy up part of the funded debt long before maturity and in the face of law.

IRREDEEMABLE PAPER.

The evils of a paper currency not redeemable in coin have long been known and should require no explanation. But it seems there is always a mental epidemic created by the delusions of this fictitious money against which many of the best minds have not been found proof. Before the late war, it is safe to say, there was not a public man in the United States of any standing who was not satisfied that gold or silver, and paper convertible at will into gold or silver, was the only safe medium of circulation. It is indeed a matter beyond a doubt that the conviction of the leading minds was that the Constitution had effectually guarded against Government issues of paper as legal-tender. Calhoun and Webster repeatedly expressed themselves to that effect. The States being prohibited especially from making anything but gold or silver a legal tender, and the grant of power to the Federal Government being only to coin money and regulate the value of foreign coin, the matter seemed to be set at rest. In fact, even the decision of the Supreme Court sustaining the legal-tender act places its legality altogether on the right of the Government to do such acts as will save the country in war, leaving the clear inference that in peace Government has no power to pass such an act; while a minority of the court, with Chief Justice Chase at its head, denied the constitutionality altogether.

Indeed all experiments in modern history with irredeemable currency stand out as a warning. We need not go to France to study the history of Law's famous scheme and of the revolutionary assignats; we have sufficient history in America. Before Law's time the American Colonies had their legal-tender notes. More than one hundred years ago the celebrated Scotchman, Adam Smith, wrote in his Wealth of Nations:

The paper currencies of North America consisted, not in bank-notes payable to the bearer on demand, but in a government paper of which the payment was not exigible till several years after it was issued; and though the Government paid no interest to the holders of this paper, they declared it to be, and in fact rendered it a legal tender of payment for the full value for which it was issued. But allowing the colony security to be perfectly good, a hundred pounds payable fifteen years hence, for example, in a country where interest is at 6 per cent., is worth little more than forty pounds ready money. To oblige a creditor therefore to accept of this as full payment for a debt of a hundred pounds actually paid down in ready money, was an act of such violent injustice as has scarce perhaps been attempted by the Government of any other country pretended to be free. It bears the evident marks of having been originally what the honest and downright Dr. Douglas assures us it was, a scheme of fraudulent debtors to cheat their creditors. * * * The government of Pennsylvania indeed pretended, upon their first emission of paper money in 1722, to render their paper of equal value with gold and silver by enacting penalties against all those who made any difference in the price of their goods when they sold them for colony paper and when they sold them for gold and silver. * * * Notwithstanding any regulations of this kind it appeared, by the course of exchange with Great Britain, that a hundred pounds sterling was occasionally considered as equivalent in some of the colonies to a hundred and thirty pounds and in others to so great a sum as £1,100 currency; this difference in value arising from the difference in the quantity of the paper emitted by the different colonies and in the distance and probability of the term of its final discharge and redemption.

On the continental money of the Revolution, I will only give a quotation from Peletiah Webster, of Philadelphia:

All the suffering and evils which the country endured from all other agencies were insignificant in comparison with the misery that resulted from the introduction and use of irredeemable paper money and the consequent irregularities of the whole American fiscal system.

We have suffered more from this cause than from any other cause of calamity,

It has killed more men, perverted and corrupted the choicest interests of our country more, and done more injury than even the arms and artifices of our enemies.

If it saved the State, it has violated the equity of our laws, corrupted the justice of our public administration, enervated the trade, industry, and manufactures of our country, and gone far to destroy the morality of our people.

At a later period in our history the great Daniel Webster in a memorable speech, often quoted and never to be forgotten, spoke as follows:

A disordered currency is one of the greatest of political evils. It undermines the virtues necessary for the support of the social system and encourages propensities destructive of its happiness. It wars against industry, frugality, and economy, and fosters the evil spirits of extravagance and speculation. Of all the contrivances for cheating the laboring classes of mankind none has been been more effectual than that which deludes them with paper money.

This is the most effectual of inventions to fertilize the rich man's field by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Ordinary tyranny, oppression, excessive taxation, all these bear lightly on the happiness of the mass of the community, compared with a fraudulent currency and the robberies committed by a depreciated paper. Our own history has recorded for our instruction enough and more than enough of the demoralizing tendency, the injustice, and intolerable oppression on the virtuous and well-disposed of a degraded paper currency authorized by law, or in any way countenanced by government.

Conspicuous in the history of our times above many of his contemporaries will always be the name of Salmon P. Chase. Chase, the great financier of the war, whose mind was inexhaustible in resources, the Secretary of the Treasury, was probably foremost among those who unhesitatingly created the currency and forced it upon the people at the time of what he thought the country's need. But after the war had closed, and when he occupied the highest judicial office in the country, with a rare moral courage and free from that small fear of inconsistency characteristic of small minds, he unhesitatingly declared the paper money which he in part had created unfit for circulation as money, and the act which had made it a legal tender and had forced it upon the people unconstitutional and void.

In delivering his opinion dissenting from that of the majority of the Supreme Court he said:

In considering this question, we assume as a fundamental proposition that it is the duty of every government to establish a standard of value. The necessity of a standard is indeed universally acknowledged. Without it the transactions of society would become impossible. All measures, whether of extent or weight or value, must have certain proportions of that which they are intended to measure. The unit of extent must have certain definite length, the unit of weight must have certain definite gravity, and the unit of value certain definite value. These units, multiplied or subdivided, supply the standard by which all measures are properly made. The selection therefore by the common consent of all nations of gold and silver as the standard of value was natural, or, more correctly speaking, inevitable. For whatever definition of value political economists may have given, they all agree that gold and silver have more value in proportion to weight and size, and are less subject to loss by wear or abrasion, than any other material capable of easy subdivision and impression, and that their value changes less and by slower degrees through considerable periods of time than that of any other substance which can be used for the same purpose; and these are qualities indispensable to the convenient use of the standard required. In the construction of the constitutional grant of power to establish a standard of value every presumption is therefore against that which would authorize the adoption of any other materials than those sanctioned by universal consent.

MEASURE OF VALUE.

Money is a medium of exchange, and money is a measure of value. This function of money, to measure values, paper cannot perform. It has no intrinsic value, and we see that it is variable in value and fluctuating; how then can other values be measured by it? The lowest state of commerce is by barter, a higher degree is by the exchange of commodities for the universal medium of exchange, that is, gold and silver; but the gigantic proportions of commerce in highly civilized countries require credit in its various forms, drafts, checks, orders, and mutual accounts, resting greatly on confidence and honesty. It may be said that the commercial nations of highest standing carry on the greatest transactions on the least handling of money. It has been stated by good authority that the business transactions in England, France, Germany, and the United States of America are in the proportion of 95 per cent. of credit in its various forms to only 5 per cent. by actual money payments. This may at least approximate the truth. When it is considered that the standard of value is the basis of all these transactions, the 95 per cent. as well as the 5, the credit transactions as well as the cash transactions, the enormous importance of a stable and uniform standard of value and the mischief which a variable, fluctuating money as the standard of value must produce, the confusion and uncertainty it must cause in all transactions, or, more properly speaking, the total unfitness of fluctuating money as a standard of value must be at once apparent. Our country has borne it with all the sacrifices it has entailed, but in our transactions with other nations we have to come to their standard, gold or silver. They measure, as has been well expressed, with a yard-stick of thirty-six inches, as we did in former times, and, so God will, may soon again: we measure with one which is thirty-two inches to-day, perhaps thirty-three inches to-morrow, and may be thirty-one the day after.

LOCAL MONEY.

This difference of our currency with the currency of the world has the serious effect of isolating our whole system. In nations with a healty currency, the question is hardly ever considered how much currency is wanted for the demands of business. Like water, money seeks its level. It keeps moving from where it is not wanted to where it is wanting, like any other commodity. But we have placed ourselves outside of this natural operation by making a kind of money worthless abroad, and therefore some of our statesmen have racked their brains to find out exactly how much money we should issue. They differ from each other by hundreds of millions, but their troubles would all be set at rest whenever they bring back the currency of the world and thereby re-establish that healthy rotation.

Senator Sumner well expressed this defect of our currency:

Being local, it is necessarily limited and without adaptability. It cannot travel abroad, nor can it receive help from abroad. All that it is, and all that it can be, are contained in itself. There it is, nor more, nor less; the same at all times, in the highest tide of business, as when business is idle. In this unchangeable rigidity, sometimes called want of elasticity, there is an evil of the first magnitude. This can be relieved only by making our currency cosmopolitan, so that it will be aided by the currency of the world.

Indeed the cosmopolitan character of commerce and intercourse throughout the civilized world has made an exclusively local currency an intolerable burden for any people not absolutely Chinese. The only possible money, for any nation with large dealings, is now the real value of gold and silver, not valuable only by coinage, but by weight and fineness. The power, tyrannical in its nature, which in a country can enforce and impose worthless paper or debased metal on its own people under the fiction that the coinage or inscription gives it value, ceases at once when it crosses its own border and is forced to fair dealing. The best governments deal as fairly with their own people as with strangers, and the only correct principle is, that the coinage stamp on a gold or silver coin is a certificate as to its weight and fineness, no more, not making the value nor adding to the value, but a ready proof of the value only.

Among the evils imposed upon the people by the fluctuating money I will single out two of the most glaring, imposing enormous and ruinous burdens, compared with which the boasted saving of interest on that portion of our debt represented by legal-tender notes stands out in all its naked folly as a pitiful delusion.

PREMIUM ON GOLD.

First, the premium on gold. When our farmer or our mechanic, our doctor or lawyer, reads in the papers that gold is at 17 per cent. premium at New York, he wonders that our money is going backward instead of advancing gradually to par with gold, as was so confidently predicted. He thinks there must be something "rotten in the State of Denmark," but it does not disturb him much, as he thinks he has no gold to buy. It might disturb him more if he would realize the fact that it is he himself and his friends and neighbors who pay that premium, not of 17 per cent., but twice that premium or more.

Who buys the gold which is sold at New York at these quotations? The speculators buy to sell again, but the regular purchasers are the importing merchants. They buy it, first, to pay their freights, which, as coming in foreign bottoms, are payable in gold. They pay their duties on importations to our Government in gold and settle their balances in Europe in gold, or remit cotton or wheat at gold prices. In making their greenback prices they add up first cost, freights, and duties, and to that add the premium on gold. Reflecting that not long ago gold was at 8 per cent., and that, for reasons they do not know, it went up to 17 per cent., they find it difficult to say what it will be in three or six months, and, to cover the risk, they take an outside figure, say 20 per cent. On this, as well as on the other portion of their investment, they add their profit. Thus, in the hands of the jobber to whom the importer sells, these 20 per cent. have become, say, 23 per cent.; in the hands of the wholesale dealer throughout the country, to whom the jobber sells, it is 26 per cent.; in the hands of the retail merchant, 30 per cent.; and in the hands of the consumer—the farmer, the mechanic, the lawyer, the doctor, or the day laborer—it is not less than 34 per cent, to be in reasonable bounds, or double the quoted premium.

The final consumers, then, or the tax-payers, for, under our system of raising the revenue for the Federal Government, the store where we buy our commodities is our tax-collector's office, and we pay our taxes in the price of our goods—pay double the premium on gold which we see quoted as the New York premium. On careful reflection it will be found that this calculation is, in most cases, rather below than above the real facts. The profits of trade and the number of middle-men may in some cases be less, in most cases it is certainly more, than here assumed. The importer, in making his prices, has to make an allowance for the fluctuations of the money, and therefore always takes outside figures, and certainly cannot take the average premium, which is only calculated at the end of the year.

The cost of importations, in gold, for the year ending June 30, 1875, was as follows:

Cost of merchandise	$533, 005, 436
Freight, 6 per cent	31, 980, 326
Duties	157, 167, 722

Thirty-four per cent. on this amount is what the final consumers pay for premium on gold when quoted at 17 per cent., amounting to $245,532,184.

The following table shows, approximately, what the people have paid in this manner as premium on gold in the last ten years. This is over and above the legitimate cost and profit on importations, solely on account of the depreciation of our currency. The amount of importations, the duties, and average "premium" in the table are official figures. Freights range, from experience, from 6 to 8 per cent. I have taken them at 6 per cent.:

Year ending June 30.	Cost of importations.	Freights at 6 per cent.	Duties	Total cost.	Average premium on gold.	Average premium for final consumer.	Amount paid for premium by people.

Or an amount of six hundred millions over and above the highest amount of the principal of the entire public debt has been the cost paid by the people on the one item of importation alone for the depreciation of the paper money below par. The total interest saved to the Treasury for ten years on this non-interest-paying debt was, on $380,000,000 legal-tender notes at the rate of 6 per cent, the highest interest on bonds, $22,800,000 per annum, or $228,000,000 for the ten years.

This will illustrate the financial wisdom which misapplied the surplus gold to the purchase of bonds not due, instead of paying off the greenbacks and returning to gold and silver.

Can a people bear this long? A ruinous tariff, sharpened and increased by this operation of fluctuating money, is consuming the very life-blood of our laboring people. Apparently in the above calculation the merchants are the exempt class, but only apparently. In all except the article he deals in, every merchant is a consumer; and, moreover, the welfare of the merchant is so closely connected with the welfare of the community in which he lives that they cannot suffer without his suffering in consequence. The money-dealers, the rich class of gold-room operators alone, who have sprung into existence since this curse of fluctuating currency is upon the country, like maggots on a decaying carcass, are thriving upon the misfortunes of the people. The wealth which has been accumulating in the money centers since the fluctuations of the currency opened a rich field for speculation has been drawn from the labor and substance of the country. No new values were created; the country is not richer; every dollar of these fortunes, enriching a few, came from the many who were impoverished. As the delta formations at the mouths of large rivers are composed of the abrasions of thousands of hill-sides in the interior, so each of the overgrown fortunes continually increasing in this manner, in New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, represents thousands of streamlets of blood continually drawn from the already depleted veins of a suffering people.

Is it possible that the very sufferers under this accursed system, the people of the South and the West, should cling to this baleful fiction instead of indignantly and peremptorily demanding an immediate return to honest money.

ABSORBTION OF MONEY.

I pass to the second great evil, viz: The withdrawal of capital from legitimate business to embark in the speculations offered by the fluctuations of our money. These fluctuations have given rise to a business of immense magnitude. There is at this time undoubtedly more ready money engaged in it than in any legitimate business in the country. It constitutes a large part of the banking business, and in the great money centers immense sums are held for purposes of this speculation alone. In its rivalry with other modes of investment it presents great attractions to the capitalist. In all other legitimate investments the capitalist has to part with his principal in order to make it bring interest. So in loaning on mortgage, in buying stocks and bonds, in building houses, investing in manufactures, in commerce or shipping, in railroads, or all other branches of the carrying trade. But the gold speculator has his entire capital always on hand. Whether he buys gold or greenbacks, he always has one kind of money or the other on hand, and makes his profit without ever parting with his capital. Add to this the charms of a gambling business and the chances of occasional great hits, and it is easily understood why enormous sums, an enormous portion of the money of the country, is withdrawn from the trade and from all ordinary channels of business and held at the money centers for purposes of speculation, often in immense combinations, sufficient to control the value of gold or paper. When it is remembered that our total currency is seven hundred and fifty millions, and that 1 per cent. rise or fall represents the sum of seven and one-half millions, the immense field for this gambling or speculating can be appreciated.

But capital cannot be withdrawn from the ordinary business of the country without very serious effects. There is in a well-regulated society a certain mutual relation between capital and labor. Indeed, the mission or object of capital in our public economy is to sustain and uphold productive labor. A certain amount of capital invested in agriculture, in commerce, in manufacturing, carrying by land and water, sustains and employs a certain amount of productive labor. It follows that capital cannot be withdrawn from its ordinary investments without disengaging or throwing out a corresponding proportion of labor. Do we not see it all around us? The cry is raised from one end of the country to the other of laborers without work, of the country being overrun by tramps, of the contraction in the employment of labor everywhere. The nature of this gambling and speculating business is one which makes the capital embarked in it a barren, unproductive element in the body-politic. Capital which combines with labor, or employs productive labor, is itself productive, but the capital in gambling produces nothing. Profitable as it may be to the gambler or speculator, it creates no values. As robbery by land or piracy by sea is compared to productive trade, so this use of capital only forces values to change hands without being in the slightest degree creative of values. Even where labor is not entirely thrown out of employment, and industry is not entirely wrecked, still the want of capital, formerly productive, but now in this piratical employment, is felt throughout the country, and every branch of industry is prostrated because of its absence.

Would our financiers cure this evil by issuing more currency, by increasing the volume and the fluctuations, feeding speculation instead of ending it, adding fuel to the fire instead of extinguishing it? Let those who complain about the want of money in the ordinary transactions of the country, and the consequent stagnation in enterprises, recognize the cause which withdraws from business the millions used in speculation in the fluctuations of money, and assist in removing that cause. Pay off the fluctuating currency, have but one money, the honest, stable money of the world, gold and silver and paper exchangeable at will into gold or silver, and that entire speculation will cease. Shut up the gold rooms and their dependencies and imitations throughout the country, and the vaults of New York, of Boston, and of Philadelphia will open, and the outflowing millions which will be compelled to seek investments in legitimate channels will impart new life to every branch of industry and trade. Considering that all the capital thus released will seek proper employment, while additional capital created by inflation would to a great extent find its way into the very hands of money gamblers, I assert, without fear of contradiction, that more capital will in this manner, by resumption of coin payment, be thrown into business than the boldest inflationist has ever proposed to issue "to suit the demands of trade."

Who does not see clearly that the agricultural and laboring population are altogether on the losing side. They are emphatically the bearers of the burden. They create the only values we have, only to be plundered of them by the operation of a fluctuating currency. Throughout the huge carnival of gambling and speculation which has convulsed the country for years, where has there ever been a share for them? For all their purchases they have to pay the inflated prices; for what they sell, the price is made in England on a gold basis. The insurance against the gambling risk, as it may be termed, which means the allowance every merchant or middle-man has to make in buying or selling for the risk he runs that the goods while on his hands may depreciate because of the change in the value of money—in every instance, buying or selling—counts against the farmer. The millions accumulated by the money-dealers and speculators are drawn from his substance.

The following authentic statement, taken from the New York World, will show that the farmers' produce has not kept pace in price with the inflated values of everything he consumes:

*Average value at New York.

	1856 to 1860.	1870 to 1874.
Wheat per bushel	$1 53.6	$1 53.6
Corn per bushel	78.5	77.18
Pork per barrel	18 36	18 20

*1856 to 1860, gold; 1870 to 1874, currency.

I have shown that the lowest interest on our national debt can only be obtained by a high national credit, and that the highest credit will never be attained while our broken promises to pay, long past due, flood the country by millions.

I have shown that the pretended saving of interest on that portion of our public debt represented by legal-tender promissory notes is a gross delusion, and that the people pay vastly more on the one item of imported goods, because of the depreciation of our money alone, for every dollar saved to the Treasury in interest.

I have shown that the fluctuations of money have created and are upholding an immense speculative business of a piratical character, which has withdrawn and is keeping from the ordinary channels of business a vast proportion of the money of the country, which can only be recalled to permanent and useful investments by shutting up that speculation.

And these evils are now operating from day to day. Speak about the wisdom of delay and the prudence of inactivity, while day by day the worm is eating at the heart of our prosperity. Cruel indeed is the prudence and cold-hearted the caution which fears to apply the saving knife to stop the destructive work of the cancer. Delay of the remedy means unchecked progress of the sickness. The cold cloud of general fear and distrust of the future has settled upon the commercial life of our country, killing every budding hope with its icy breath. The re-animating blessing of confidence and trust can only be restored, not by halting and insincere professions, but by open, unreserved, and honest action.

Confidence is said to be a plant of slow growth; but more than once public opinion has instinctively felt the presence of an honest purpose in the public councils and met it with a sudden and generous response of confidence, accomplishing the work of years as with a magician's wand.

The importance of immediate action cannot be over-estimated. We need, and the country demands, above all, the establishment of a definite financial policy. Perhaps, of all the evils of our unsettled currency, the uncertainty as to the future, felt by every one, is the most paralyzing to business throughout the country. The approach of a party convention, of a session of Congress, fills every capitalist who holds our securities, and every business man in the country who is to any extent a creditor or a debtor, with apprehension. Capital is proverbially timid, and a state of periodical fear is not calculated to foster and inspire confidence. Without confidence there is no investment, without investment there is no business.

A speedy return to a money system based upon the money of the world, gold and silver, alone can bring about the feeling that we have arrived at a lasting and settled financial condition. No one will fear, when we have once re-established a coin basis, that we will ever go back to irredeemable paper, for a war like the one which created it is henceforward impossible. Whatever plan shall be adopted to bring about this desired end must be adopted now to make an end of uncertainty, and it must be adopted in a manner clear and distinct, practical and well defined, so that the country will understand exactly what it means, and it must be irrevocable and final.

In the debates of the Forty-third Congress a distinguished republican Senator said:

> Uncertainty in the policy of a government in reference to finance is one of the worst of public evils. If you can mark out a policy, if it be not the wisest policy that could be devised, if nevertheless it is a clear and positive policy, if it opens to the public mind the ideas of Congress and the course that is to be pursued, men at once adapt themselves to it.

Judged by this test, the act of January, 1875, must certainly be considered a failure. It indicates no plan of resumption, nor does it provide for the means. All the late discussions show that the act is not considered by the country a settlement of the question at all. The first article, providing for the redemption of fractional currency, is the only article of any value; but even that value depends upon collateral measures. If that redemption is made part of the general redemption of the currency, going steadily on to the end without intermission, and thereby raising the currency to par, the silver will remain in circulation and do its service; but if it is left an isolated measure, the silver will disappear from circulation as fast as it is issued, and even that will be a failure. The only practical result of the law of January, 1875, could be to postpone action until 1879.

But if that act is of no value, why postpone anything to 1879? No careful reader of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury can fail to see that his statement of the difficulties of hoarding a large amount of gold until 1879, to be then used in redemption, is an excellent argument against hoarding until 1879 and in favor of using the coin for redemption as it is collected.

I cannot imagine a single reason for returning to specie payment which is not at the same time a reason for returning to it as soon as possible. No cause for delay can be given. We expect nothing in the near future that will alter the present state of things. Nor should we, like that British financier, Mr. Wilkins Micawber, "wait for something to turn up." If we believe earnestly and honestly that the relief of a great evil will come by resumption, in the name of God let it come at once. In the uncertainty of the future it might be well to consider that the nation might at any time be drawn into a war. A war while our currency remains unsettled would at once depreciate our money, would be of enormous cost, and would postpone the settlement of our finances indefinitely.

I would therefore urge a speedy commencement of resumption. But before passing to the mode of resumption which I consider the most practical, I will review some of the reasons given by advocates of delay.

It is held by some that we cannot resume specie payments until the balance of trade has turned in our favor. It is sufficient to answer that for many years we sustained specie payments and enjoyed high prosperity while the balance of trade was steadily against us. But the logical conclusion of this argument would be that as soon as we would succeed in turning the balance of trade against England, for instance, we should force England to abandon coin payment and take to irredeemable paper. Trade will never be exactly balanced. The balance of trade has always been, and always will be, on one side or the other. The idea that a nation when the balance of trade turns against it should be forced to irredeemable paper money is absurd and not sustained by a single fact in history. We know the causes that have brought about the various experiments of irredeemable paper money, but the balance of trade had never any connection with such causes.

Again, it is said that we have not enough gold or silver in the country. Gold and silver have been driven out of circulation by the presence of an inferior money. Bad money always drives the better money out of circulation. The reason is plain. If a man has debased money which is valueless abroad and has a forced value at home, and he has at the same time gold or silver valuable all over the world, he will pay his debts and make his purchases with the inferior money, paper, and keep his gold; and in course of time, knowing that the stocking-bank or a hole in the ground into which he could bury his gold pays no profit or interest, he sells his gold and silver at a profit, and operates with paper, which answers his purpose. So the gold and silver leave the country and go where they are wanted. In this manner gold and silver have been driven out of the country, and the metals from our mines find a foreign market. The only use of gold now is in the importing trade, and just as much as is needed for that is held in the country, because only that much pays to hold. The banking business of the country, the loaning of money, insurance, and all uses of money which bring interest and profit on the same, are all done with paper, and gold over and above what is wanted would bring no interest. Consequently, like cotton, like wheat, or any other commodity, it goes where it is wanted and where it therefore brings profit. It floats to countries where it is money and brings profit and interest. Let it be made our money again and again become profitable, and it will find its way here again at once, to just such an extent as it will become profitable. The higher interest alone which is generally paid on this side of the Atlantic will always facilitate the floating of gold and silver to this country.

I will quote from a high authority, Walter Bagehot, on "the experience of the Bank of England:"

> Foreign payments are sometimes very large and often very sudden. The cotton drain, as it is called, the drain to the East to pay for Indian cotton during the American civil war, took many millions for a number of years. A bad harvest must take millions in a single year. In order to find such large sums the Bank of England must require the steady use of an effectual instrument. That instrument is the elevation of the rate of interest. If the interest of money be raised, it is proved by experience that money does come to Lombard street, and theory shows that it ought to come. Loanable capital, like every other commodity, comes where there is most to be made of it. Continental bankers and others instantly send large sums here as soon as the rate of interest shows that it can be done profitably.

These objections then can be considered entirely irrelevant. Of no more serious weight is the argument that it is an injustice to the debtor to raise the value of the currency with which he has to pay his debts. There is hardly a distinct class which should be called a debtor class. In most cases debtors are at the same time creditors. They owe money and have money owing to them. But, apart from that, debtors do not make the owing of debts their sole pursuit in life, they are at the same time farmers, merchants, mechanics, manufacturers, they have some business or other. They are never gold speculators. I have shown that gold speculators are the only class of men who profit by the fluctuations of the currency, and that all others suffer. It is safe to say, therefore, that in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred the debtor, as business man, will gain more in the improvement of general prosperity and in his general business relations by a steady currency than he will lose by paying his debts in a better money. But where would this reasoning in favor of a debtor class lead to? If it proves anything, it would prove that we must take measures, for the sake of the debtor, to always keep the currency debased, and, if necessary, to depreciate it by legislation. For, if it injures the debtor, that the currency rises to par with gold and silver, it would be immaterial to him by what cause the currency is so raised, whether the rise be spontaneous, through its intrinsic merit and value, or by legislative action toward resumption of coin payment.

A year ago, when currency was only 8 per cent. below par, the friends of paper exultingly declared that the money was on a steady advance to par. They proposed to wait and do nothing, inasmuch as paper would soon reach par, and then we would have a coin standard without any measures for resumption. Half a year later, paper had gone back to 17½ per cent. below par. We learned that letting the currency alone would not achieve the object. Their predictions were exploded. Now, will they not have the candor to admit that if their predictions had become true the debtor class would have passed exactly through the same ordeal as when money is brought up to par by gradual resumption of specie payment?

Some losses there will always be; they have to be borne now or later; but have not the creditor class in this last year lost also by loaning money when it was worth ninety-three cents and receiving it back when it was eighty-four cents on the dollar?

This is no argument which should arrest action. The sudden shock to business which is feared by many from a resumption of coin payment will be avoided by making that resumption gradual, as I propose that it should be made. Moreover, the fears of panic or violent disorder in business on resumption are in the very nature of things erroneous. Panics are caused by doubt and fear. What doubt can there be by the removal of all cause of doubt? An honest, open policy, a final compliance with engagements long deferred, a clear course laid down for the future, which "he who runs may read," can cause no doubt nor want of confidence, but, on the contrary, must create confidence, and can therefore create no panic. "Honesty is the best policy;" from this rule there is no exception.

Finally, it has been urged that we had better wait for easier times before we begin to resume. The state of the currency, it may be answered, the uncertainty of our financial future, which deters timid capitalists from investment, are among the chief causes of our hard times, and their removal by resumption will be one of the chief elements in the cure. We are in every way in as good a condition to resume now as we have any reason to expect to be in the future.

In the early part of my remarks, I have said that the inscription on the face of the legal-tender notes contains the whole argument. I have shown from it the nature of the promise and defined the obligation. But it also points out the only honest plan of dealing with it.

"THE UNITED STATES PROMISES TO PAY TO BEARER TEN DOLLARS."

As in geometry there is only one straight line from one point to another, while there are a thousand more or less crooked lines around, so with all the numberless devices, the squirming, the plans how to get around that obligation; there is but one honest and straightforward way to settle this matter, and it is, like all true solutions, plain and simple. Thirteen years ago the United States promised to pay $10 to the bearer of this note in coin, for, remember, at the time of making this promise a dollar meant a dollar in coin, and the only mode of meeting the problem now is to pay those $10 in coin and all the other like promises likewise. None of the by-paths, substituting other promises for these, nor giving slips of paper called "absolute money," nor 3.65 interchangeables, nor any other of the numerous schemes "how not to do it," will comply with these promises. The only compliance is to do what you promised to do.

I will now pass to a proposition of the manner in which the redemption of these notes should be carried out. And I will first remark, that while the main proposition, the immediate commencement of the extinguishment of this debt by paying it in coin, is in my opinion demanded by every interest of our country, and while on that point my convictions are strong and immovable, I do not pretend that the details of the plan I submit are not capable of improvement and will not need perfection at the hands of those familiar with all the workings of our system. I will put before the House a definite, tangible, and feasible plan, however, to be considered, discussed, altered, or amended by those who have something better to propose.

Commence with the resumption of fractional currency on the 1st day of June next, paying out one million per month, commencing with the smallest denominations as they are not as apt to be withdrawn from circulation. After this resumption or redemption has been going on for five months, commence redeeming the legal tenders on the 1st day of November, 1876, by selling ten millions of gold or silver every month for legal-tender notes. Simultaneously the taking up of the fractional currency continues at the rate of one million per month until exhausted. At the end of each month all redeemed currency is to be destroyed by fire. Repeat the same process every month, until finally all those promises to pay the three hundred and seventy-five millions of legal tenders are paid, canceled, and destroyed.

No law need be passed repealing the legal-tender act, no law setting a certain day when contracts are to be paid in coin. The operation of that system of redemption will, slowly and surely, from the very day of the passage of the bill, bring up currency gradually to par without any violent shock or change. When the last legal tender is destroyed they will belong to history, and then we will have no money except gold and silver and redeemable paper, for the national banks will keep pace with the advance of the legal tenders to par as their circulation is now redeemable in legal tenders. Long before the last legal tender shall be destroyed they will be equal to gold and silver, and the banks will as willingly redeem in coin as in legal tenders. The means for this operation will be obtained in this wise: First, all the surplus receipts of gold in the Treasury, over and above the mounts necessary for the payment of interest on national bonds and specified necessary gold expenditures, shall, from the passage of the law, be appropriated for the redemption of legal-tender notes alone, until they are all paid and canceled. Is the obligation to pay thirty millions per annum to the sinking fund any more sacred than the promise of the legal tenders? One is a theoretical obligation not affecting our credit, and in which no one has an interest; the other is a promise upon the fulfillment of which rests the welfare of our people, the order of our commerce, the restoration of credit, and the return to a sound financial system. But we need not even be forced to a choice between these two obligations. An amount of one hundred and eighty-three millions of the surplus gold has been used for the purchase of bonds over and above the requirements of the sinking fund, and to the detriment of the obligation to pay the legal-tender promissory notes. Let that amount of bonds be turned over and charged to the sinking fund and we will be relieved of further purchases for more than five years, which is more than the time required for the redemption, and can apply the entire surplus gold in the Treasury for that purpose. That surplus has heretofore averaged more than seventy millions, but in this last year has come down to fifty-four millions. It is reasonable to suppose that with revival of trade it will increase.

By making the appropriation of all the surplus gold operative at once on the passage of the bill and beginning resumption on the 1st of November, 1876, we would commence on the present amount of gold in the Treasury and the accumulation of six or seven months more, always deducting as a matter of course what is required for the payment of interest on bonds. This fund, increased during the progress of redemption by the current surplus, would be sufficient to carry redemption for say ten months at the rate of ten millions per month. But after that there would be deficiencies every month of nearly five millions, provided that the payments would continue at the rate of ten millions per month. To create a reserve fund to cover these monthly deficiencies, I propose to grant authority for the issuing of one hundred and twenty millions of bonds bearing 4 per cent. interest, to be sold for gold or silver only when required and in quantities as may become necessary.

But there can be no doubt that before the lapse of those first ten months of the monthly redemption currency will have reached par with gold and silver. No compulsive measure is proposed to be passed to force the presentation of greenbacks for redemption. The motive urging their presentation will be, at first, the higher value of gold and silver. When that motive has ceased by paper reaching par, then the presentation for redemption will become slower, and it is exceedingly doubtful whether, after the redemption of the first one hundred millions, they will be presented at the rate of ten millions per month, or even one-half of that amount. In case of presentation falling off in that manner, the time will increase and the monthly amount of coin needed will be reduced. Thus very little of that reserve fund, if any, may ever be called for, and the ordinary surplus in the Treasury from customs receipts may be found sufficient for the entire redemption on this plan. Indeed, when I consider the total disappearance of a motive for presenting the legal-tender notes for redemption after they have become par with gold, and the fact that the presentation will always involve more or less exertion, perhaps expense and risk through agencies, not counterbalanced as I say by any gain, I feel convinced of two results: First, that the reserve fund of one hundred and twenty millions as provided will never be used, and will only act as a strong reserve in battles has sometimes acted, by the moral effect of its presence; and second, that Congress may hereafter be compelled to make regulations to bring about the presentation of the rest of the legal-tenders and their cancellation by such measures as the rule to replace no mutilated notes by others, but by coin, and to cancel all those that are paid by way of taxes, and not use any in disbursements.

If I am correct in this reasoning, (and I have a firm conviction that I am,) then my entire plan would simply amount to this: that the accumulations of coin in the Treasury shall not be hoarded and withdrawn from circulation, but shall be used in redemption of our promises as fast as they accrue, and that, so far from requiring the withdrawal of coin from any other source and so far from assisting in its burial in the Treasury vaults, it will keep all the gold and silver in circulation, adding to the volume afloat instead of reducing it.

Throughout my argument I speak of gold and silver alike. Silver has lately depreciated in value because it has ceased to be money in Germany, as it had before in England. Only for fractional coin is silver there used. The great markets have been China, Japan, and the East Indies. In India the market has lately diminished greatly by the general falling off of money remittances to that country, its balance of trade with England having changed. Silver, from rating formerly with gold in this country as one to fifteen, is now less than one to sixteen and one-half. The tendency, unless checked, would be for further depreciation. Now, it certainly cannot be the policy of the United States, having the richest silver mines in our own borders and in the adjoining provinces of Mexico, with which our dealings will steadily increase, to depreciate silver.

Whatever policy European nations may find proper to adopt, it is clearly our policy that the value of silver as money should be sustained on the American continent. Therefore I would propose the rapid coinage of a silver dollar of weight and fineness to be equal to a gold dollar, and I would give it a more important part to perform in our circulation than ever before. Let it be made a legal tender like gold and no one will complain. The downward tendency caused by the displacement of silver in Germany will be counteracted by the appreciation here. As a medium of exchange at home it is equally valuable with gold. In Mexico the greatest transactions are made with silver, without its ever being considered inconvenient. In this country, gold and redeemable paper being at the same time in circulation, where the bulk is an objection, either of the other kinds of money can be used. But the bulk is sometimes an advantage. I have known more than one instance where the robbing capacity of a thief or robber was limited by his carrying capacity. That late steal of $47,000 carried from the Treasury in the breeches-pocket of a clerk could not easily occur with that much silver. I think that silver should be received with gold in payment of customs, and the one hundred and twenty millions of the reserve fund for redemption, if used at all, should be offered always in small quantities only as needed, and for silver as well as gold. In the same proportion as received silver should enter into the redemption of the legal-tender notes. This, it is presumed, will create a home market for all of these bonds that may have to be sold.

It may be mentioned that Congress will meet every year during the operation of this plan, and can provide for such change of detail as may be called for and found advisable.

The national-bank system has been mixed up with the question of resumption. No change should be attempted until after redemption of all the currency of legal-tenders. I look upon the national banks as being a most valuable ally and assistant during the period of redemption. Their currency, three hundred and seventy-three millions, is redeemable in legal-tender notes, and as a matter of course will keep step with the greenbacks in advancing to par, and will finally be redeemable in coin, and then entirely unobjectionable. This is a currency of three hundred and seventy-three millions which will not be touched, and will continue in circulation all the time, and be a fly-wheel, as it were, to the machinery of redemption. On the other hand, there are many who desire the abolishing of the national-bank issue, and a change of the entire amount of the currency to the Government notes. This would be a deplorable step; a pledge, I should take it, that this generation does not mean to have coin payments again. For consider what the change would be. At present our total paper circulation is about seven hundred and fifty millions, one-half legal-tender and one-half bank currency. By redeeming the one-half of Government notes, the other half, as a matter of course and without a dollar cost to the Government or the tax-payers, becomes redeemable in coin and the burden of that conversion falls upon that class of our people who have profited most by our financial condition, and are most able to bear it—the owners of the national banks. But by first changing the entire circulation of the banks into legal-tenders, and then having the entire seven hundred and fifty millions to meet and redeem in coin, would double the task on our hands and make redemption twice as difficult, besides throwing it entirely on Government. Virtually it would be turning our back upon resumption forever, and our road to honest metallic money, for come it will ultimately, would lie through national bankruptcy and ruin.

But there are other reasons against this change. Our people, and more particularly the democratic party, have always maintained that our Government is and should forever be one of limited powers, and one of a circumscribed sphere of action. Are we prepared to yield the very essence of our institutions and make our Government the chief banker and money-dealer of the country, sapping and destroying its foundation and corrupting the last remnant of honesty in its composition? And for what? The impression has been created, by folly or design, that the interest on the four hundred million bonds held by national banks as the basis of their circulation would be saved. Is it possible that any one pretending to an opinion should be ignorant of the fact that these bonds are not issued for that special purpose, but are part of our pre-existing, funded national debt, created for war expenses that had nothing to do with banks? That the bankers had to purchase them from other holders, in many cases in Europe; that they bore the same interest before the banker held them as they do now, and will bear precisely the same interest after he shall cease to use them for security as now; and that the only result of a change, as proposed, would be that the present holders, citizens of our country, would probably sell them and the interest would most likely have to be paid in Europe hereafter instead of at home? It is a remarkable fact, ridiculous if it were not sad, that any considerable portion of our people should be ready to run their Government into banking and money dealing, not temporarily, as during the war, but permanently; to throw off their principles of government like an old garment; to sell their birth-right for a mess of pottage, only to find out too late that the pottage was all a mistake. Fortunately there is still a barrier in their way. There is not the shadow of a doubt that the Constitution forbids any additional issue of irredeemable money as a legal-tender.

It may be noticed that contraction forms no part of my plan of resumption. In this I must confess that I differ from most of the advocates of hard money. Inflation and contraction have only a meaning while we retain this isolated currency. When we determine to pass over to a currency of gold and silver and redeemable paper, and take steps to it at once, we need not fear inflation nor desire contraction. With such a currency once attained inflation has no terrors. We cannot have too much gold or silver as long as the whole world is open to them and regulates their value. That contraction must precede resumption is erroneous. I see nothing to be gained or saved by it. We cannot contract without giving full value for what is withdrawn; where then is the gain? The total amount of our legal-tenders must be paid off one way or another. Contraction would not raise the paper to a par with gold. It is and remains no more nor less than a promise to pay at an indefinite time, wholly at the option of the debtor and bearing no interest, that debtor having the prestige of ten years' default. Such a paper can never be at par with gold. The legal-tender act alone gives it the value it has; the repeal of this act would certainly bring it down to a low figure. Therefore I see no good in contraction.

On the other hand, a redundant currency like ours is at present at the beginning of redemption will help us over what might be a temporary trouble.

I think that the passage of a law embodying the plan of the payment of these promissory notes in coin, as I have indicated, would at once raise the value of our currency, and that by the 1st of November, when payments begin, the discount will have been very greatly reduced and currency will have made great progress toward par. The rate at which it will advance is of course a matter of conjecture, but the following causes will all co-operate to a rapid rise in the currency, or, as some prefer to call it, a decline in gold.

First. The promise to pay, now indefinite and doubtful, will at once become by the passage of the act definite and certain, and thereby gain an intrinsic value.

Second. Doubt being removed by a settled policy and the end of gold speculation becoming apparent, capital will be withdrawn from these speculations, will find courage for permanent investments, and will appear everywhere in permanent business.

Third. The appreciation of paper or the decline of gold will not be fluctuating like before, but, the day of settlement being fixed, will set in steadily toward par; therefore gold will not be as desirable an article to speculate in, as it cannot be held with a prospect of a rise, but must be held with a certainty of its decline, if held at all.

But in spite of these co-operating causes, gold and silver may on the 1st of November, and may be for three or four months afterward, possibly worth so much more than paper-money as to cause the coin to be bought up and shipped or put out of sight. The result would be that for those three or four months ten millions of legal-tenders per month would be withdrawn from circulation without the equivalent in coin taking its place in circulation. The withdrawal of such an amount from circulation might be seriously felt if redemption were to commence on a contracted currency, especially as it would be accompanied by imaginary fear of more contraction; but a redundant currency at the beginning will help the country over that time imperceptibly. In other words, the redemption of legal-tender notes may of itself work a temporary contraction, and therefore should not be preceded by contraction.

For this reason, if for no other, the redemption of legal-tender notes by bonds is objectionable, as it would withdraw money and not replace it by other money, but by interest-bearing bonds, which are investments, but not money. Only for one purpose would I consider the sale of bonds advisable. If all the gold in the Treasury is used for redemption, and the Government should fail, against all hopes, to retrench and reduce its expenditures, currency may be needed for deficiencies in the current expenses of the Government. By selling small amounts of bonds for legal tenders to cover such deficiencies only, and at once paying out the legal-tenders, they would remain in circulation until, in their turn, they are redeemed and destroyed. But it is to be hoped that Congress will succeed in so reducing the expenditures as to avoid such deficiencies and avoid the necessity of the sale of these auxiliary bonds. As soon as currency reaches par value, gold, silver, and currency will indiscriminately appear in the receipts of the Government, as well as in its disbursements. Currency once at par and all the hoards of coin in the country will open, our financial brooks and rivers will run with a steady current, and the day of our deliverance will have arrived.

Among the various causes for our hard times, the general distrust in our railroad investments and other enterprises of associated capital, caused by the widespread dishonesty in their management, occupies a prominent place. European capital, which for a time flowed with a steady current to sustain our railroads, has entirely ceased to invest in them. Watering of stock, contracting companies, absorbing the means of honest investors, and all other notorious devices of the kind, have permanently, at least for present calculations, deterred money from such investments. Inordinate greed has killed the goose which laid the golden egg. I only mention this subject so far as it has a bearing upon our public finances. Money is gathering at all the money centers of Europe and our own country in immense amounts for want of investments which command confidence. The inevitable result will be that first-class Government securities, these rival investments being removed, will be sought for more than ever. It seems inevitable that, with the competition of investors, first-class governments will soon get money at a lower interest than ever. Now then is the time to remove the last dead weight on our credit, the broken promises which now flood the country, and turn our attention to the reduction of the interest on our national debt.

I have said nothing partisan in the course of my remarks. The question is a national, not a party question. But no party can afford to give it the go-by. A party which has no pronounced opinion on this, the most important interest of our people, will never be intrusted with the government of our public affairs.

The national democratic party has given a distinct pledge in its platform of 1872 in favor of the earliest possible resumption of specie payments. So far it never had the power to carry out a policy.

The republican party has created the debt; the promises of the legal-tender notes are its promises. Since the war, having unlimited power, all it has done was to re-iterate the promises to pay the greenbacks "at the earliest practicable period" in the law of 1869, and declare them payable in coin.

It is not too much to say that it has never taken an earnest step toward resumption while it held the power. It is entitled to all the credit for what has been well managed in our national finances during and since the war, nor can it escape the responsibility for all the shortcomings.

[When Mr. SCHLEICHER had spoken for one hour, Mr. HOLMAN asked leave that his time be extended; which was agreed to, there being no objection.]

Mr. HILL. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] has made a very able argument. Before he takes his seat, I would like to ask him a question for information. I understand that by his plan he proposes to retire within a certain period all the legal-tender currency.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Not within any certain period, because, as I have shown, if we propose to pay $10,000,000 monthly of legal-tenders, just as soon as this currency reaches par only a portion of that amount, perhaps only two or three million dollars, will be presented monthly for redemption, because the motive for presenting these notes for payment will have disappeared. If $10,000,000 should be fully paid every month, the redemption of all the legal-tender currency would be effected in about three years and a half; but most likely the process of redemption would in its practical operation extend over five or six years. After this currency had once reached par there would be, as I have said, no motive for its presentation; and as some exertion or trouble would attend the presentation, it is not to be expected that the full amount monthly would be presented. The actual amount presented would doubtless come entirely within the surplus in the Treasury; we should require no reserve fund, no new means.

Mr. HILL. Then, as I understand the gentleman, his plan would not in point of fact retire all the legal-tenders; but if that should be the result, what currency does he propose to substitute, national-bank currency or State-bank currency?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. All legal-tender currency would be retired. I want no State-bank currency; either the present national-bank currency and gold and silver, or, as I am not wedded to the present national-bank system, I will say I am in favor of some safe system of banking which would give us for our circulation besides gold and silver, paper money convertible at into gold and silver at the will of the holder.

THE FINANCIAL PROBLEM; HOW SHALL IT BE SOLVED?

Mr. WARD. Mr. Speaker, the present embarrassment of our financial and commercial interests demands serious and profound attention. Its effects are felt by the people of all pursuits in every part of the Union, and, without distinction of party, they imperatively require the application of the best attainable remedy. Capital lies idle in the vaults of the banks, and has been offered at lower rates of interest than at any other period in the history of this continent. The number of business failures in the year just closed was seventy-seven hundred and forty, larger than in any previous year. In 1874 the number exceeded that in 1873, and so on, with one exception when it was stationary, the failures have gone on increasing every year since 1862. Multitudes of men and women, to an extent hitherto unparalleled, are presenting that "saddest sight on earth" of being able and anxious to work, but unable to find the work to do.

To understand the nature of the disease which is now preying on the vitals of the country, we must refer to its origin and trace its insidious progress, reviewing the financial history of the war impartially and in the light now thrown upon it by the decisive lessons of the past.

The rebellion was precipitated on the country unexpectedly to the party in power, who were slow and unwilling to comprehend its real magnitude. The repeated prophecies of leading statesmen, that it would succumb in a few weeks, are yet fresh in our memories, and will never fail to arrest the attention of all students of our history. As the nature of the impending dangers was not understood, neither the military nor pecuniary measures needed to meet them were promptly undertaken. The antiquated and exploded financial theories of obsolete European statesmen and of our own in former days were again put into practice and once more proved to be erroneous. Those who gave more far-seeing counsels were fortunate if they escaped opprobrium. While the North believed that the crisis would rapidly pass over, the South mistakenly supposed the North would yield to its demands. The battle of Bull Run, when the capital itself was endangered, in part dissolved the illusion on both sides; but the financial errors which had taken root were destined to be worked out to their logical results, which have now swept over the country and can only slowly be overcome.

The policy of deluding by make-shift expedients, instead of following the standard of the real and permanent good of the public as fixed by immutable natural laws, was too conducive to the personal and partisan interests of those in power to be readily abandoned. At an extra session of Congress, in July, 1861, it was simply indicated that, in view of the expected brief duration of the war, the Government would make a loan of a hundred and fifty millions in gold from the banks of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. Before the 17th of November, in the same year, they had actually advanced one hundred and forty-six millions in this form, and their system was so strong that after the last part of the loan had been nearly or quite paid, the gold and silver in the banks, which had at the beginning been less than fifty millions, was forty-two millions. The specie for a long time returned to the banks in the ordinary course of business. The Treasury continued to demand "thirty millions a month," and insisted that this should be paid only in coin. The banks yet had more than sufficient specie for the transaction of their own business, but further steps were taken to destroy the State banks.

The Government, which should have guarded the banks carefully, so that they might have kept up the value of the currency by a knowledge of their strength, scattered the gold, and it could neither be lent over again in sufficient quantities or made available as a reserve for the banks. Suspension followed on the 31st of December, soon after the meeting of Congress at its next regular session.

Even in the beginning of January, 1862, specie and paper money yet remained of equal value. At that date due sagacity and prudence would have prompted the instant adoption of a system of adequate taxation and other well-considered and suitable measures of providing for the expenditures of the war. The Government, having by its own action forced the banks into suspension, authorized on the 25th of February, 1862, a large issue of "legal tender," receivable "for all debts except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." In those notes the distinction was, for the first time in history, made by a government between specie and its own paper. Thus the door was opened wide to the enormous overissue of paper money, which led to the inflation of prices, and but for our natural wealth and strongly national spirit would have been fatal to the Government and immediately disastrous to the business of the people. It was deemed more creditable to create fictitious and exaggerated prices of labor and commodities and an artificial appearance of prosperity than to enforce prompt taxation.

The Administration having created an unfailing demand for gold, and fanned the fire of speculation by the terms of the original notes which were exchangeable for United States 6 per cent. bonds, withdrew even this right of redemption after July 1, 1863, and, more anxious to produce a seemingly low interest than to protect the people against an actual depreciation of the national securities, which reached the low rate of thirty-five cents on the dollar, made an inglorious and suicidal effort to raise loans at 5 per cent. The continuance of the right to exchange the "legal-tender notes" for 6 per cent. bonds might have effectually prevented the currency from becoming redundant, as it might have been continually checked by investments in the bonds for the sake of interest. The 6 per cent. bonds were sold at the rate of $1,500,000 to $2,000,000 a day—amounts nearly equal to the daily expenses of the Government. Of the loan at the lower rate, little was taken except by bankers, who used the bonds in the organization of national banks. The funding was substantially arrested for several months. Many times the sum of the interest sought to be saved was lost in the enhanced rates of purchase for the Army and Navy, and, under a needlessly inflated currency, a war debt of over $2,800,000,000 was incurred, although the value received, reckoned in gold, was probably not more than forty cents on the dollar on all the expenditures of the war.

The currency continued to be further inflated, without any provision for converting it into interest-bearing bonds, until by the 30th of June, 1864, the natural fruits of the mistaken policy became palpable to its advocates. The currency and other temporary loans amounted to over $1,125,877,034.

The Administration having created a market for gold, with a constant supply and demand, through paying interest on bonds in gold and refusing to receive its own notes in payment of duties on imports, the congressional majority by joint resolution increased the previously extravagant duties to the amount of 50 per cent. on all articles indiscriminately for sixty-three days, ending with the 30th of June, 1864. The necessary consequence was that gold rose rapidly and enormously, or rather that the currency correspondingly depreciated. Congress, alarmed and anxious to stem the tide it had thus set in motion, passed a "gold bill," approved June 17, 1864, with the vain hope of checking the depreciation of the currency by prohibiting time contracts for the sale of gold. Violations of the act were to be punished by fines and imprisonment. The ill-advised step only added fuel to the flame. Its result was a temporary closing of the gold-room, leaving purchasers at the mercy of individual dealers, and, next, a mania of speculation, during which gold reached its maximum of 285, the actual premium having more than doubled within about two months. The pernicious effects of these glaring violations of the laws of common sense and political economy were so immediately obvious that both acts were short-lived, the gold bill being repealed in fifteen days after its passage.

The protracted duration of the war, so widely at variance from the early and rose-colored assurances of the administration, added to the excessive issue of paper money and its great depreciation, induced distrust and discredit of the Union. Instead of wantonly diluting the currency and willfully diminishing its value, so as to tempt purchasers of bonds, or, in the phraseology of the day, to "float the debt" nominally at par, but really far below it, a strong specie reserve should have been maintained, and the paper dollar kept as nearly as possible at its par value. This would have given confidence, and the people or Government would have received a full or fair equivalent for the money they are compelled to pay. Throughout her recent great calamities France, in pursuance of a policy well worthy of profound attention, never permitted her currency to reach a discount of over 2½ per cent., and yet one dollar of hard money would have bought nearly three dollars of ours, and our bonds were depreciated to a corresponding extent. No other nation has ever, during war or any other great exigency, made such distinctions, discrediting her own currency by persistently recognizing and enacting its inferiority to the precious metals.

It is little to the credit of the party which for the last fifteen years has been intrusted with the management of our financial affairs that, although France maintained her paper money practically at par during the misfortunes which ended in a loss of some of her best territory, throughout a terrific civil war, and although she paid a ransom of $1,000,000,000 and interest, our "legal-tender," or Government paper money, is yet at a discount varying from 12 to 13 per cent., and gold once reached a premium of at least 185. The public debt of France is more than twice as large as our own. Her area is more than one-third less than that of the State of Texas alone and only about one-twentieth part of that of the Union. Her population, long nearly stationary, and recently diminished, was, in 1872, little more than thirty-six millions, while ours is now about forty-three millions, and is probably increasing at the rate of nearly a million and a half yearly

Judging from the past, our national wealth will double in about eight years, a rate of prosperity three or four times greater than that of France. Yet, with her far inferior resources, and throughout the pressure of almost unequaled misfortunes, the outstanding issues of the Bank of France not redeemable in specie never exceeded $640,000,000, and were lately $489,000,000, against which it holds $300,000,000 in the precious metals, but insists, as a preliminary to the resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1878, on a further reduction to the amount of nearly a hundred millions of the issues lent to the government.

Our basis of credit being, as we have seen, far superior to that of France, the contrast between her financial management and that of the administration of this country deeply condemns the latter. Acting without forethought, and in one of those blunders which are sometimes said truly to be worse than crimes, it borrowed and dissipated the specie held by the banks, and paid away its own, instead of encouraging and keeping a reserve, which would have made the currency nearly at a par with coin, and thus have retained at nearly the same standard the current value of its bonds and the articles needed in the war, enormously diminishing the burdens of the people, who, through the shameless waste of their credit, now pay, in the common standard of the world, debts contracted under the fictitious valuations of an irredeemable currency, which the administration, by its example and its laws, taught the people and the world to distrust.

Our Government took no efficient or well-calculated steps to keep up the value of our note circulation. But this object was the first aim of France. Our administration fed speculation, willfully producing an artificial state of things and an appearance of prosperity which deceived many. The Secretary of the Treasury, with the hope of reducing interest, caused an immense depreciation of the currency and brought upon us the long train of disasters from which we have not yet recovered. His was the policy of selling notes at half or one-third of their face for the sake of saving 1 per cent. in interest. France, on the contrary, arrested speculation by advancing the rate of interest through her bank and kept down prices, thus encouraging exports and enabling her government to buy at fair prices. Her financial policy was the reverse of ours and the result was more propitious. The chief practical example she now gives as an appropriate lesson for the condition in which we are placed is that, by means of an enlightened and moderately liberal commercial policy for the benefit of the people at large, and not the favoritism of the few, and by maintaining a large reserve of specie in her bank, she circulates free of discount a nominally inconvertible paper currency to the amount of over $500,000,000.

Although, owing to the unparalleled natural wealth of our country, the results of defying the positive laws of political economy were long delayed, the time necessarily came when the speculations thus set afloat were subjected to the inevitable test of realizing money from them; and it was found they rested on no adequate foundation. The administration had transferred its financial agencies to men who had been foremost in advocating its sophistries and strenuously striven to delude the people by promulgating the doctrines that "a national debt is a national blessing" and that "debt is wealth." The leading and most trusted advisers and co-operators of the Government in its financial affairs became the most conspicuous speculators. The system significantly culminated in the failure of the houses which had been most highly favored and trusted by the administration. A run for deposits almost immediately followed. The sixty banks of New York were liable for $200,000,000 to their depositors. Speculation had become so rife because the currency was far in excess of legitimate commercial demands that, to meet the emergency, the banks had depended on "call-loans." The bank loans throughout the United States far exceeded those of any other date, and the ratio of cash to deposits and circulation was then, as it had been for the two previous years, less than at any other time during the last forty years. In New York, within little more than three weeks, the "legal-tender" reserve was reduced from thirty-four millions to less than six millions. The securities on which the "call-loans" had been made became unsalable except at ruinous prices.

Prominent among the results of the stimulation of a false currency was a mania for the construction of railroads, which averaged nearly six thousand miles for the five years ended in the crisis, against an average of about eleven hundred in the seven years ended with 1866. The reaction was so disastrous that railroad bonds to the amount of $567,028,639 were in default, and considerably less than half of the railroad stocks in the whole country paid dividends, entailing losses and ruin on multitudes of innocent sufferers. These disasters, though more easily computed than many others and larger in amount than any other single class, are probably little more than fair specimens of the wide-spread calamities. Many manufactures, notably those of iron, cotton, and wool, were suspended or put on short time. Laboring men and women were thrown out of work to an extent previously unknown in the history of our country; immigration, that prolific source of our prosperity, decreased; multitudes returned to Europe to spread abroad in every land the tidings of their disappointments and deter others from embarking; and the number of bankruptcies in 1873, as also in 1874, exceeded that ever before known, except in 1861, the year when the memorable destruction of trade and capital was caused by the war. From that time to this the commercial confidence necessary to the employment of labor has been impaired, and the poverty of the masses and crime have increased beyond all former precedent. In addition to other burdens, we sustained in 1871 and 1872 losses by fire in the cities of Chicago and Boston amounting to $300,000,00 , an amount of wealth as irretrievably lost as if it had been swallowed in chasms caused by earthquakes or thrown into the midst of the ocean.

All the calamities we now endure would have been incalculably more general and severe but for the prompt action of the clearing-house through which, when the crisis occurred, the stronger banks of New York combined to sustain the weaker by combining their reserves of legal-tender notes and issuing interest-bearing loan certificates, which were made the media for the payment of differences.

It is instructive to note that throughout the history of our country commercial panics have universally followed large expansions of the currency. By unsettling values and stimulating wild and reckless speculations which, but for a superfluity of the circulating medium, would never be undertaken, they draw money away from sound investments which would yield permanent profit to those who make them with a view to enriching themselves by rendering real services to the people at large. The national industry has been misdirected, a course analogous to waste of time and money misspent by an individual. The violent and well-remembered panic of 1837 followed an increase of $54,796,320—or from $94,389,570 to $149,185,000—in the circulation within the brief period of three years, while during the same period the loans and discounts, which practically are for many purposes a part of the currency, increased $200,996,261, or from $326,119,441 on the 1st of January, 1834, to $525,115,702 on the corresponding day in 1837. Until seventeen years afterward the aggregates of the loans and discounts of the banks never were so great as in 1837. In 1857, the year of the next great panic, they had increased to $684,456,887, and in the two preceding years the currency had increased from $186,952,223 to $214,778,822. In 1860 the paper currency was $207,100,000, but in 1866, under the republican régime, the outstanding circulation had increased to $648,866,000, and on July 1, 1875, to $727,640,588, exclusive of over forty-one millions of fractional currency.

The notion of many of the advocates of expansion is vaguely that it would be substantially a distribution of money among the masses at large; but it is in fact one of the most seductive methods of depriving those who depend on their labor and industry of their just reward, placing colossal fortunes in the hands of a few, to whom it gives a lion's share of the little the people individually possess, taxing their labor and that of their descendants, and thus endangering even the Republic and the liberties of the people. This has been the uniform experience of mankind, and it is aptly illustrated by the history of our country in the last fifteen years, during which we have had an irredeemable circulation, and when, while wealth slipped more rapidly than ever into the hands of speculators, the number of bankruptcies exceeded those of any former term, and poverty, distress, and crime have made alarming progress, unprecedented in the history of our country.

It may be freely admitted that, at first sight, the theory that paper promises to pay are capital is not without some show of plausibility. Currency is the symbol of wealth, and the shadow is frequently mistaken for the substance. It is, in fact, when inflated, nothing more than so much "watered stock." The value is nominally increased, but the actual property remains the same. Sooner or later the fraud is exposed, but from time to time this is again forgotten, and a new era of inflation and delusion begins, to end in the same way as its predecessors. The experiment has often been made, and as often attended by the same bitter lessons. Yet, with new men, the old errors are repeated. Happily for mankind, nations are long-lived, seldom dying, and in some degree the wisdom gained by one generation filters down the course of time to its successors. As on some points the laws of finance are as positive as those of physical nature, the experience of other countries is instructive.

In 1797 the Bank of England began, under authority of Parliament, to issue excessive amounts of notes, which the London merchants agreed to receive at par. Even this could not prevent their depreciation. Parliament seconded the ineffectual efforts and in 1811 passed the celebrated resolution that "the price of gold had advanced, but the value of bank-notes was not depreciated"—a complete counterpart to the declaration of one of our own Secretaries of the Treasury, who claimed to be the author of the legal-tender system, that gold had increased in value but that his paper money had not depreciated. In 1814 a British "gold-bill" was passed, enacting that "the taking of gold coin at more than its value or bank-notes at less shall be deemed a misdemeanor." It was as ineffectual as our own. The trade in the precious metals was conducted as openly as ever and the depreciation of the notes continued. No effort was made to enforce the impotent law. The notes remained below par for nineteen years. At last the celebrated "bullion-committee," appointed by Parliament to investigate the calamitous condition of British financial affairs and their inconsistency with the theories too generally believed, recognized the actual depreciation and declared that this was the cause of the general advance in prices. Its main conclusion was that "the country ought to be brought back with as much speed as is compatible with a wise caution to the original principle of cash payments at the option of the holders of bank-notes."

The highest officials of the time, the London bankers, and the nation at large, with the exception of a few thinking men, long continued to re-assert that the large volume of the currency had nothing to do with the rise in prices; that the bank-notes had lost nothing of their value, and that no restriction of the circulation was needed. It was not until eight years afterward that the public had been instructed by the logic of events, and, with few exceptions—which, however, included the directors of the Bank of England—the truth of the doctrines held by the committee was universally admitted.

The following axioms were regarded as incontrovertibly established:

If gold is at a premium in paper, the paper is redundant and depreciated, the premium measures the depreciation.

If the inferior currency be removed, the exchanges will be turned, the overflow will stop, and, if any vacuum is created, gold will flow in to supply it.

A better and a worse currency cannot circulate together. The worse will drive out the better.

The views of the committee have long continued to be, in substance, the laws of finance in Great Britain; and for more than thirty years the use of bank-checks and other modern means of facilitating payments has been so great that there has been no material increase in her paper currency, although during the same time her commercial transactions have been multiplied fourfold.

The depreciation of the currency of France under the regency of Louis XV has become proverbial. At its origin it had its advocates, but although France prohibited the use of coin and decreed even the penalty of death for those who refused to receive the paper at par, it fell until the equivalent of a $100 in our money would buy only a single pound of butter. At last it became utterly worthless; the people by common consent returned to a specie currency; and the author of the scheme only escaped from the country at the peril of his life.

Austria has been slower to learn, and her disasters have been prolonged to a much more recent date. Sixty-five years ago her currency was so far reduced in value that she issued "redemption notes," in which it was to be "redeemed" at the rate of three to one. This having failed, she over and over again, under new names, such as "Viennese legal-tender" and "anticipation notes," vainly sought to provide substitutes for a metallic standard. In 1873 she suffered from a panic bearing a close resemblance to our own. After her war of 1866 large issues of paper money were made, which led to a belief in the abundance of capital and to speculations of all kinds. The government itself gave aid by guaranteeing dividends on various railroads. The market was glutted with an immense quantity of so-called securities, in which it was for the time impracticable to distinguish between the good and the bad. The inevitable crash ensued. As in this country, the leading speculators were the first to suspend. Their example was soon followed by a multitude of smaller operators. Even the strong houses were shaken. The bourse was closed to prevent violence among its more adventurous members, some of whom committed suicide.

In the yet brief history of the United States and Canada the same lesson has been no less imperatively taught. I pass over the examples to be found in the records of the individual States and colonies. Franklin himself, early in the revolutionary war, warmly approved the issue of bills "on the faith of the continent." One member of the Congress, who seems to have been alone in his views or in the courage needed to avow them, urged taxation, but was bluffed by one of the almost unanimous majority, who, in a spirit of which we have conspicuous examples in our own time, asked "if he was to help to tax the people when they could go to the printer's office and get a cart-load of money." The currency decreased in value until monstrous sums were needed to buy a cow or procure a frugal meal. It became exchangeable only at the rate of a thousand dollars for one sound dollar. This, too, in spite of penal laws to enforce the impracticable wishes of Congress. The historian of the time says:

Wealth was accumulated by the dishonest multitudes of contractors and the many defrauders of that unhappy period, while more deserving men felt that it had been plundered from their own coffers for the aggrandizement of such people.

No thoughtful statesman ever overlooks the precedents establishing the positive conclusion that wherever legislators have attempted by penalties to compel the people to take irredeemable paper at par with coin the laws of the strongest alike with the weakest governernments have signally failed in enforcing their wishes.

Stripped of the sophistries with which it is frequently surrounded, the necessity of a fixed standard of value in all the commercial and monetary affairs of the nation is so clear that he who runs may read it. Paper money may be freely used; checks or bills of exchange, aided by the railroad, telegraph, and post-office, may transact nearly all such business of the country as is on a large scale, and tend to prevent any exorbitant rate of interest; but it is essential that all these means should simply represent one universal and uniform standard. Without this guard, they become uncontrollable and unsound—extortionate taskmasters instead of good and faithful servants.

In the minds of many men affairs of state are surrounded with a confusing mystery, as if the principles of ordinary facts and common sense could not be applied to them. Yet it is plain that trade in grain of any kind would be placed under such enormous disadvantages as to render it almost impossible if the bushel measure of to-day might be larger or smaller to-morrow from causes the farmer or merchant could not foresee and altogether independent of their control. The dealers in textile fabrics, and in land itself, would be in strange predicaments if the yard and the foot were subject to great and frequent variations, and might represent at one time little more than a third of their measure at another. Yet the obstacle which has been thrown in the way of the trade and prosperity of the country is almost exactly of the same nature. The "legal-tender" dollar at one time was worth little more than a third of the true dollar, and continually changes from day to day, making trade uncertain and values of all kinds doubtful. No man knows when he rises what they may be that morning, or when he goes to his place of business what they may be before the sun sets. It is an established fact that the greatest possible certainty of value is attainable only by enforcing the standard of the precious metals; they become the property of whatever nation or individual will give most for them. Their portability and the universal recognition of their value throughout the world make them the natural and least fluctuating medium of exchange, and arbitrary legislation has been and seemingly always will be unsuccessful in discovering or enforcing any stable substitute for them.

Gold by the Constitution of the United States is a legal tender, and as a necessary consequence, the standard of value. That instrument gives no authority or power to any department of the Government to issue legal-tender paper, or a currency payable on demand. The only ground upon which it was issued during the civil war was that of seeming necessity, it being supposed that the existence and supremacy of the Government were involved. Without entering into the conflicting decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, it is sufficient to know that they indorsed the issue of legal tender, but only as a war necessity. It necessarily follows it could not otherwise be legally issued. Under a proper construction of the Constitution this is impossible; and as democrats adhere to that instrument, they cannot for a moment contend for such a proposition.

When the legal tender issued by the Government is withdrawn, it must cease to issue more or any paper currency whatever.

The right to control the financial affairs of the country by increasing the circulating medium at his own will is too dangerous a power to be lodged in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. That high official is seldom chosen for his adaptation to the special duties devolved upon him. He may be one who has attained political rank, yet be profoundly ignorant of the simplest facts and principles in modern science, and become a mere partisan intriguer. At another time the holder of that office may be a man of sterling principles, sound doctrines, and pure character; but in the change of parties there can be no certainty of this. We know the common weaknesses of human nature, and should guard against them by making the temptations to do wrong as few and slight as possible. Hence the aim of all good citizens should be to separate the Government from the business of banking. It cannot remain in the hands of the Government without creating such centralization and influences as are hostile to the spirit and perpetuation of republican institutions.

Upon the withdrawal or redemption of the legal-tender and the resumption of specie payment the issue of new currency should be practically free to the banks to any extent on the deposit of national bonds as security for the circulation. Under these conditions there would be free trade in money. The law of supply and demand would solve the question of the currency, and the largest practicable amount of benefit the banks can render would be attained, while the circulation would kept within moderate limits and gradually attain the true and honest standard of the world. As one of the ultimate results, the time may come when their notes, amply secured by Government bonds, in a proportion which will assuredly command specie, may be accepted by the Government in payment of its dues and re-issued for its current expenses.

I do not know any more striking instance of the forgetfulness of yet recent history and the superficial consideration, too often with the most deplorable results, given to the affairs which concern us all, than the impression on the minds of some candid men, and the loud and re-iterated assertions of others, that the democrats are the party of inflation, and the republicans are the most reliable supporters of a sound currency and a return to specie payment. The traditional policy of the democrats is that of a currency redeemable in hard money, and will be so to the end. Individuals are to be found who on other points agree with them but believe in the pernicious doctrine of an irredeemable currency. They are not the party, and misrepresent its well-known and hitherto universally admitted tenets. On the other hand, the republicans, from the beginning of their possession of power to the present time, have uniformly practiced the fraud, and attempted to justify it, until their efforts were no longer availing. They took from the banks the power of paying in specie, are responsible for the whole existing system of paper money, and in the height of their delusions took from it the redemption on national bonds which would certainly have led the country safely to specie payments many years ago.

Some, although holding general allegiance to the republican party, were so far patriotic and wise as to warn it against the cause from which most of our financial evils sprang, and have since wrung from it spasmodic promises of reform which have been as often broken.

There are many conspicuous instances of this practical deception. One of them was the first act of Congress approved by President Grant after his inauguration. In clear and terse words it explicitly declared that "the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of the United States notes," and that Congress "pledges its faith to make provision at the earliest practicable period for the redemptiom of the United States notes in coin." The hopes thus given were fallacious. The congressional majority arrested the contraction begun by McCulloch when Secretary of the Treasury, and supported by the illegal inflation by Boutwell and his successor. Six years ago, in 1870, the premium on gold fell to 8¼ per cent., and yet it was not long ago 17½, and is now about 13. During the last six years, under republican control, paper money has receded further from approaching to an equality with gold.

The people are vitally interested in a return to a specie basis. The paper they now receive for services, daily toil, and general business purposes is worth only eighty-seven cents on the dollar, through its depreciation to that extent below gold value, which they pay for nearly all the articles required for daily use. No sophistry can long continue to delude them, while a vigilant press penetrates the remotest parts of the country, into a belief that such depreciated and inconvertible paper money is the best currency.

The expediency of a return to specie payments may now be taken for granted. The present time is the most opportune we have had since inflation began for making vigorous preparations for specie payments. The premium on gold has been reduced by commercial causes, apart from legislation, from 185½ to 12 or 13 per cent., thus indicating that the remaining steps to gold at a par rate with notes can gradually be safely retraced by no extraordinary amount of statesmanship, provided it is sincere and persevering. Since the war began the circulating medium has increased three times as fast as the population. In New York the accumulation of money and the low rate at which it may be had are unprecedented; but few borrowers whom the capitalists will trust are to be found. Low as the rate of interest throughout the world has long been, money was for several months cheaper in New York than in the great cosmopolitan market of London, the difficulty of our capitalists having been to find profitable employment for their currency at home. A similar state of affairs prevails, though in a minor degree, at Chicago, Cincinnati, and the other great financial centers of the Union. Even the bill passed June 20, 1874, with the intention of increasing the currency, has proved, as clearly as the thermometer shows temperature, that more is not needed, and that there is a redundancy above the wants of the people. Under its operations, and after allowing for the new circulation, there has been a net contraction of the paper currency to the amount of over twenty millions within a year. Banks are unable to employ their money at fair profits. The legal-tender and other reserves held by the banks of the country at this time are largely in excess of the requirements of the law.

The abundance of money throughout the civilized world affords peculiarly favorable opportunities for funding or obtaining specie and foreign credits, which, to a certain extent, are identical with each other. The futility of expanding the currency was signally demonstrated when the Secretary of the Treasury, during the panic of 1873, issued, without authority of law, $26,000,000 of notes, in the vain hope of relieving the money market. These notes did not enter at all into the general circulation, but were hoarded by savings-banks and trust companies, as were those which had been already withdrawn from the banks of discount and deposit. Large exportations of grain to Europe from this side of the Atlantic are expected. Our imports have enormously shrunk. The people themselves are more than usually free from debt; and last, but not least, is the encouraging fact that their minds have been long and carefully prepared by an increasingly intelligent press, never before so sound and well informed on financial topics, to take more than superficial views and look beyond the delusions of what is merely immediate and temporary to that which, though slightly more remote, is permanent and real. The Government, at present unable to redeem its promises to pay, may never again have so good an opportunity of beginning the process of exchanging its bonds at a low rate of interest, or the national banks of laying up the reserves of specie, on which, in their hands, under the wholesome law of free competition, the restoration of prosperity depends.

On the other hand, if the policy of the expansionists could be followed, the return to specie payments and the successful funding of the debt, long ago due on demand, but yet unpaid, will become more and more difficult, until, as we have seen has repeatedly been the case in other countries and our own, the control of legislation will be lost, broken promises will be renewed only by making more of them, and wide-spread disaster, misery, repudiation, and national dishonor will ensue. We have reached a point where any expansion of an irredeemable currency means its indefinite increase, and are approaching that crisis against which the united wisdom of many generations warns us, in the maxim that the descent to destruction is easy, but the labor and work of retracing our steps is difficult if not impossible.

We have now arrived at the period when inflation no longer inflates. In the body political and financial, as in the human body, there is a point where the power of stimulants ceases and can no longer prevent collapse. This is the law of all serious panics and their results. There is a great shrinkage in business, and no important revival can be expected until a new financial system which will deserve and receive public confidence is fairly begun. In proportion as there is a cry for inflation, capital, proverbially timid, seeks for safety, withdraws from enterprise, and refuses to employ labor. Until the future policy of the Government is permanently settled, there will be no real renewal of the commercial and general prosperity of the country.

The act of January 14, 1875, passed by the last republican Congress under the previous question, cutting off all debate, has done more than any other single measure to produce expansionists. It has created alarm in business circles and given to inflation an importance it could not otherwise have attained. The impression is that if the act is rigidly enforced the contraction of the currency will of necessity be so rapid as to produce again widespread disaster, and such undoubtedly would be the case if resumption were really enforced at the date named for it, January 1, 1879. While the majority of this House is not responsible for this act or its consequences, it should not be repealed unconditionally and without substituting for it some better measure having for its object the resumption of specie payments at the proper time. A modification of the law, and more in accordance with the true interest of the country, will be no doubt effected. So long as the Government continues practically to insist that its own notes are of an inferior value to the precious metals, a most serious financial error is committed, and a policy in opposition to the resumption act, and far-reaching in its effect, is perpetuated. I express only the general opinion of the most sagacious financiers when I say that so long as this barrier remains specie payments cannot be attained for many years.

I regard a moderate contraction of legal-tender as indispensable and vital to the resumption of specie payments. It is the necessary guarrantee to be given by the national legislators to the people that they may confidently rely on the sure approach of a sound currency, but so far as it is enforced it should be so gradual as not to disturb too violently the various existing interests of the production, commerce, and property of the country. Thisshould be done by funding legal-tender paper into bonds at the lowest practicable rate of interest. This simple process fairly carried out would probably turn the foreign exchanges in favor of this country to such a degree that we should not only retain the immense product of our own mines, but that there would be returned to us a sufficient amount of the precious metals, now driven away to other lands by excessive paper issues, to enable us to resume specie payments. All this would be done by a process perfectly natural and in strict harmony with the well-settled principles of trade and finance. The time to resume will be when we are prepared to do so, and is not within the ken of legislators, be they ever so wise, to fix definitely by statute.

At the same time there should be some definite and absolute provision for moderate but steady contraction. Among the possibilities of the future is such a demand for money as would make it unprofitable for the banks to convert the legal-tender they hold into bonds at the lowest rate of interest. I would therefore suggest as a means of gradual contraction, and with a view to rendering more certain the resumption of specie payments, that if the Government should authorize the purchase and cancellation of some moderate amount, say $1,000,000 per month, of the legal-tender notes, and authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to sell 5 per cent. bonds—if bonds at a lower rate of interest cannot be negotiated—of the United States to provide funds for that object, the first great step would be taken toward resumption, without injury to the financial and business interests of the country. Under the recommendations of Mr. McCulloch, when Secretary of the Treasury, contraction on a larger scale was begun, but Congress, fearful of the effect, withdrew its assent. I propose that the rate and method of contraction shall be so gradual that Congress can have no excuse for again intervening. Rigid adherence to such a course would indicate a determination to return to a sound basis; the absence of the inferior currency would be gradually supplied by the superior; the problem as to the method of resumption would be solved, and the system work itself out by a natural process, while individuals and the banks would have ample time to prepare for a new condition of affairs. Business being thus adjusted upon the new basis, confidence would return, and with it prosperity would prevail.

The country is disposed to look to the democratic party for a return to economy and integrity in the administration of public affairs and for the introduction and adoption of measures well calculated to restore to a safe and harmonious basis the financial, commercial, and material interests of the nation. It yet remains to be seen whether the leaders fully recognize the exigencies of the occasion and realize the necessities and hopeful expectations of the people.

FINANCE AND CURRENCY.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, House bill No. 79, which I introduced and which I propose shall accompany and be the basis of the remarks I shall make on this occasion, contains two distinct propositions:

First. The repeal of the national banking law.

Second. The institution of the American monetary system.

In the discussion of these subjects in due amplitude there are certain fundamental principles that must be kept prominently in view, otherwise there would be danger of mistaking effects for causes, and of running into errors not less injurious than those we propose to correct or remove.

1st. That there are but two pure principles of government—the autocratic and democratic. The former is founded on the principle of centralization, and the latter, on that of decentralization. The laws or mode of administration adapted to the autocratic principle must be such as will vest all political power in the emperor or individual sovereign, with the power to control or command all the property of the empire so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of the government. Under the democratic principle, the laws or mode of administration must be such as will recognize and concede all political power as the right of the whole people.

2d. That the design of the founders of the Republic was to establish a government on the democratic principle, recognizing in the people every essential attribute of sovereignty; a government that, while giving to the individual citizen the largest religious and political liberty compatible with the good order of society, would protect all in their natural right to enjoy the fruits of their labor and talents. This being conceded, it follows as a deduction of logic, as well as a doctrine of democratic politics, that all grants of special privileges, powers, and immunities to favored individuals, classes, or corporations are repugnant to the principles upon which our institutions are based, and consequently without warrant in the fundamental law.

I propose in what I have to say to treat these subjects in a practical, business manner, and not from the so-called scientific stand-point. The views and arguments I shall advance have been gathered from observation and experience rather than from what others have said and written. Most, if not all, of the works that are regarded as authority on finance and political economy have been written in the interest and support of the autocratic or aristocratic principle of government, and consequently are no guide for us. The authorities I have consulted most, and upon which I rely for support of the arguments I shall offer, are the Decalogue and Davies's Arithmetic. These are applicable alike in all just governments.

We are in the close of the first century of our national existence. As we are about to enter upon the second, it would seem to be fitting that we should recall, review, and estimate the past, and consider whether we have so administered the Government, so used the wonderful natural gifts with which we were endowed at the commencement of our national career, as to verify the opinions and predictions of the fathers, and justify the hopes and good-will of the friends of mankind.

The President, in his late message to Congress, refers, with seeming pride, to the advancement we have made in the hundred years of our national existence in population and wealth, in the arts and sciences, in agriculture, commerce, and navigation, in mechanics, mining, and manufactures, and in the freedom of the bondmen, and in general education. After presenting what I regard as the bright side of the picture, the President very appropriately advises the review of the past, which I propose to make; advises study of the means of preservation and advancement, and attention to threatening dangers.

The centennial picture has a reverse side, with images in sad contrast with the President's. One hundred years ago we entered into the family of nations with acknowledged and respected independence, and with an almost limitless domain, rich in all the elements of national wealth, with unequaled natural advantages and facilities for their development, and with a hardy, self-reliant, industrious, and economical population. Impelled by the love of freedom, and attracted by our cheap and fertile lands, immigration poured in upon us from all the countries of Europe. Increase in our population and wealth was steady and rapid, defiant of all error in policy and in legislation. But the great element of labor has not escaped its enemies. It encountered, and has all along borne, the wrong of hostile conspiracies on the part of money and monopoly, created and fostered by laws made in the name of the people. It has been oppressed in the distribution of the wealth its hands have made. It has subdued the forests; opened our mines; erected our furnaces, mills, and factories; constructed our ships, canals and railroads; and to it we are mainly indebted for the progress we have made in the arts and sciences; yet a large portion of the people toil day by day for a mere subsistence, destitute of the comforts and conveniences necessary to make life enjoyable. Another class, small in number, not physically, intellectually, or morally better than the average of society, and who, for the most part, never raised a finger to perform any useful labor, or gave a moment's thought to any subject for the common good, have acquired, by means of cunning fiscal contrivances and other partial and vicious legislation, the larger proportion of the products of industry and enterprise. We have so squandered the public domain, by sales to speculators and in donations to railroad and other corporations, as that, in less than two decades to come, the Government will not have a single acre of tillable land. We have created railroad, bank, and other corporations of every conceivable kind, character, and nature, and endowed them with powers and granted them privileges superior to those of natural persons, until the legislation of the country, national and State, is so largely under their control, that, instead of a government of the people, we have a government of corporate capital and of special legislation, adverse to common right and interest. We have delegated to private corporations the sovereign power to make money and regulate the value thereof, and, by giving the credit of the people to those corporations created by our gracious hands, have invested them with power to grind and oppress the industrial classes. By that delegation of power and gift of credit we have invested corporations with power to establish the standard of distribution between money and production, to control, perplex, disturb, and ruin business, and to appropriate to themselves the increase of wealth due to industry and enterprise.

The present condition of the country closes the contrast. No fervor of language, no art of rhetoric can heighten the impressiveness of the statement. Public spirit, enterprise, industry, and progress—labor and its food and comfort—are under indentures of mortgage, and property is menaced by the martyrdom of the hammer.

I cheerfully concur with the aspiration of the people for relief and remedy, and will proceed to show that a false and oppressive monetary system has been the cause of that condition, and to present and advocate the measure and means of rescue.

As money is the most potential power in public affairs, and affects all material interests, a knowledge of its nature and functions is necessary to its wise institution and salutary use.

MONEY

Is a legalized agent, invented to facilitate the exchanges of property and products and to pay debts. To be fitted for the performance of these functions it must have uniform credit and equal legal powers in the payment of debts throughout the jurisdiction of the government instituting it and putting it into circulation. These properties or powers are imparted to it by the law making it a tender in the payment of debts, and are in no degree dependent upon the quantity or quality of the material by which they are expressed. The only thing that gives one substance the preference over another for the material of money is its superior convenience. It has no material value, but only an immaterial or legal value. Money, when rightly instituted and honestly put into circulation, is evidence that the holder has, either directly or remotely, given value or rendered service to the government whose impress it bears, and, consequently, is a legal lien on all the property for sale in the nation in the same sense and to the same extent that the bond or interest-bearing obligation of such nation is on all the property in it, whether for sale or not.

Money is national, not universal, as claimed by the bankers and bullionists. There is, practically, no such thing as the "money of the world." Our coin is not current money in other nations. They only receive it as a commodity, and greatly prefer our bullion in the settlement of the balance of trade. Commerce between nations is the exchange of the products of the soil and goods and wares of one nation for those of another, and is never carried on upon legal values, but upon actual values—practical barter. Hence, the argument, that if we adopt a national currency for our internal exchanges it will operate injuriously on our foreign trade, has no foundation in practical experience.

Money, whether of gold, silver, or any other substance, parts with its properties and powers as a circulating medium when it passes beyond the jurisdiction of the government instituting it and making it a legal-tender in payment of debts. This theory is not inconsistent with the claim of the advocates of an exclusive metallic currency, that it is the amount of labor expended in the production of the so-called precious metals—gold and silver—that qualifies them for a medium of exchange; for if it be the law that nothing but gold and silver shall be money, and if A shall, by his labor in the mines, produce the quantity of these metals equal to $1,000, the Government will coin or stamp the product of his labor with the legal powers of money, when every other person in the nation will be bound to accept it for the products of his labor or procure it to discharge his debts. Now, if B should furnish supplies or render service to the Government to the value of $1,000, and if he were willing to accept in lieu of that number of gold and silver dollars, or in satisfaction of his claim, a Treasury certificate, stamped or coined lawful money of the United States, I can conceive of no valid objection to the Government complying with his request. The certificate would represent the same amount of labor expended or service rendered to society, and would perform all the uses of a medium of exchange equally as well as the gold produced by the labor of A—better, because more convenient. The Government or people, in their corporate capacity, having received a fair equivalent for the certificate before it is put into circulation, it becomes, legally and equitably, the obligation of every citizen in the nation. Under these circumstances it would seem that no good citizen would denounce it as an "engraved lie," or refuse to accept and honor it as his own obligation, for the uses for which it was intended. To be consistent, those who oppose the issue of a full legal-tender currency by the Government in the payment of its debts should insist upon the adoption of an exclusive metallic currency, for the system of one currency redeemable in another, before it will pay a debt without the consent of the creditor and perform the other offices of a circulating medium, is the most cunning device, the most dishonest contrivance, ever invented for the robbery of those who produce and distribute the wealth, for the benefit of the mere money-mongers.

The power to make money and regulate the value thereof carries with it the power to fix the value of all the property in the nation, and to effect its distribution, and is therefore an essential attribute of sovereignty. This was clearly the view entertained by the framers of our organic law, for the Constitution of the United States gives Congress absolute power over the circulating medium of the nation, and prohibits the States from emitting bills of credit to circulate as money or to make anything a tender in the payment of debts except gold and silver coin, or, in other words, what Congress shall have established as a legal-tender.

THE RATE OF INTEREST DETERMINES THE VALUE OF MONEY.

Money is also the standard of distribution to capital and labor. This is its most important function, or rather the most important principle, of a monetary system. In the present state of society capital and labor are joint partners in the production of property and products, and the rate of interest maintained on money or loanable capital determines what proportion of their joint productions shall be awarded to capital for its use and what to the laborers for their services. When the rate of interest on money or loanable capital is equal to the net surplus production, over and above what is consumed in the production, the laborer must work for a mere subsistence of food, clothing, and shelter, and when it exceeds the net annual savings two to three fold, as it has with us in the past, the inevitable consequence is to produce the periodical monetary crises and commercial revulsions we have had in the past and are now experiencing. But it may be asked how we are to ascertain what would be an equitable rate of interest on money or non-producing capital? With agriculture, which is the leading interest and the foundation of national wealth, as the basis, we can approximate the rate nearly enough for all practical purposes; for the increase in this important branch of industry may be accepted as the true index to the increase in all other branches of useful industry.

The following is an inventory of the farms and products of agriculture of the nation, as per census reports for the decades ending in the years 1850, 1860, and 1870, respectively:

Decade ending 1850.

Deduct valuation in 1860			6,022,777,154
Total increase in lands and products during the decade ending in 1870 being 4.4 per cent. in the ten years, or ,37 of 1 per cent. per annum, compounded annually			265,338,065

The increase in the twenty years from 1850 to to 1870 was 45.4 per cent., or 1.9 per cent. per annum.

I am aware that these rates are greatly below the general estimate, as well as below the rates as shown by the census reports, but the rates as given in the census reports are obtained by placing a fictitious valuation on the several descriptions of property named. This, I think, is fallacious, for the reason that a bushel of wheat will afford no more nourishment at two than at one dollar, and the same is true of all other articles of food, clothing, and shelter; nor is the power of the horse to produce increased by arbitrary increase of valuation in the inventory. So of lands when used for agricultural purposes. The yield and value of the products being unchanged, the value of the lands must of course remain the same. The difference in the quantity and value of our exports at the different periods is so slight as not to affect the general result. Of course, the extremely small increase during the decade ending in 1870 was owing mainly to the large withdrawal of men from agricultural pursuits to fill the ranks of the Army; but as the increase during the decade ending in 1860 was greater than during any like period in our previous history, I think it safe to assume that 3 per cent. is fully up to the average rate of increase, and therefore the highest rate that can be paid for the use of money or non-producing capital without impoverishing the producing classes and preventing the development of our natural resources. I now propose to demonstrate that the exorbitant rate of interest on loanable capital, fostered and sustained by the pernicious monetary system of the past and present, is the main and is of itself a sufficient cause for the periodical derangement of our agricultural, mining, manufacturing, and other useful industries and for the monetary crises and commercial revulsions, and that, so long as the present unjust standard of distribution between capital and industry and enterprise is continued in force, we can have no general permanent prosperity.

Before descending to details, and for the purpose of bringing clearly before the mind the real issue involved in this financial controversy, (which is not so much a question of the quantity or quality of the currency as the establishment of an equitable standard of distribution between the industrial, enterprising classes and the money-lending class, between the borrower and lender,) I will contrast the effects of the 10 per cent., or labor-robbing dollar, with those of the 3 per cent., or labor-rewarding dollar, on the general business interests of the country.

I will start with the earliest history of the country and come down to the present. The first Anglo-Saxon settlement on this continent was made at Jamestown, Virginia, in the year 1607, or two hundred and sixty-nine years ago. We will suppose Captain Newport, who headed that colony, to have purchased of the mother country all the territory embraced within the present limits of the United States for $1, and given the obligation of himself and his successors, payable, principal and interest, two hundred and sixty-nine years after date. It would become due the present year, and doubtless those who have not carefully considered the subject of the power of money to accumulate by interest would regard it as a good arrangement or investment for the present occupants of the territory. This, however, would depend entirely upon the rate of interest named in the bond. At 10 per cent., the amount would, in round numbers, now be $136,000,000,000, or over five times the value of all the property, real and personal, in the nation; while at 3 per cent. it would be but $2,840, or equal to the value of an ordinary fifty-acre farm or one foot front of a first-class city lot. The amount at 10 per cent. would be forty-eight million times greater than at 3 per cent. The real issue, then, is between these two kinds of "dollars." The advocates of "hard money" propose to force the Government to adopt the former, or rather to continue it in use, for we have it under the present banking system, and it is just what the specie-basis fraud always did and always must, in the very nature of things, give us. On the other hand, the advocates of a legal-tender currency, issued directly to the people in the payment of the debts of the Government, contend for the adoption of a system that will make the latter, or labor-rewarding, dollar the money of the realm. But the bankers, bullionists, and others of the money-lending class defend the present extortionate rates of 6 to 10 per cent. on the Government securities and other safe investments on the ground that they are not above the rate of increase in the national wealth. To show the fallacy of their arguments in support of this assumption, we will assume the value of all the property in the nation, real and personal, one hundred years ago to have been $1,000,000,000, which I think will be regarded as a sufficiently low estimate:

The following table will show what it would now be, allowing it to have increased according to the several rates named:

At 10 per cent	$13,782,000,000,000
At 8 per cent	2,200,000,000,000
At 7 per cent	868,000,000,000
At 6 per cent	339,300,000,000
At 5 per cent	131,500,000,000
At 4 per cent	50,470,000,000
At 3½ per cent	26,570,000,000
At 3 per cent	19,220,000,000

Now, I think it safe to estimate the present value of all the property in the nation, real and personal, at $26,000,000,000. It was, as shown by the Census Report of 1860, $16,160,000,000. Allowing it to have increased at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum for the last fifteen years, it would now be in round numbers $26,000,000,000. It will be seen that if the national wealth had increased at the rate of 10 per cent. it would now be 530 times; at 8 per cent., 85 times; at 7 per cent., 33 times; at 6 per cent., 13 times; at 5 per cent., 5 times; and even at 4 per cent. nearly double that amount.

Now, labor and the capital employed in productive industry and legitimate enterprise—in other words, the producing element—is paying rent or interest to the property-renting and money-lending classes, as rent or interest, on at least one-half the amount of the national wealth, or $13,000,000,000; and it is safe to say that the rate of interest which governs the value and rent of all property will average fully 8 per cent. This would give, as the annual cost of capital, $1,040,000,000, while the increase on the $26,000,000,000 or whole amount of the national wealth at 3 per cent. would be but $780,000,000; thus leaving those engaged in legitimate business, who are necessarily the borrowers of capital, indebted to the capitalists or money-lenders in the sum of $260,000,000 at the end of the year.

EFFECTS ON OUR TRANSPORTATION, INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL INTERESTS.

For the purpose of showing these effects I will take the rates of 4 and 10 per cent., which are about the relative rates of interest on money or loanable capital in all legitimate business with us and in England.

First on our shipping interests. Let us suppose an English company to propose to an American company to establish a daily line of steamers between New York and Liverpool, and that it would require twenty-four vessels, costing on the Clyde $500,000 each. As matters now stand, the American part of the company would not be likely to engage in the enterprise without first procuring from our Government a subsidy in some shape. If they should happen to belong to the free-trade school, they would ask for and be content with the removal of the duties on the materials entering into the construction of their vessels and on ship stores. On the other hand, if they should belong to the protective school, they would ask for a subsidy to indemnify them against the higher wages paid to labor here than in England in the construction and operation of their vessels. Let us further suppose that Congress should say to those gentlemen, whether they belonged to the school of free trade or protection, "We feel so deeply interested in having our merchant marine restored to the high seas, that we will not only comply with your requests, but we will guarantee that you shall have twelve vessels of the same capacity and in all respects equal to those of your English partners at the same cost, and that your seamen's wages, supplies, repairs, insurance, and all expenses shall be the same as theirs; but you must employ American capital at our rates in the enterprise." This would, of course, be perfectly satisfactory; for with us the question of the cost of capital or rate of interest is never raised in connection with enterprises of this kind. The political economists of both of these schools seem to regard the cost of capital as a matter of secondary importance.

The advocates of protection have not in the past complained of or asked to be indemnified against the higher rates of interest paid for the use of capital, but only to be protected against the higher wages to labor here than in Europe. On the other hand, the advocates of free trade assume that our manufacturers can pay 10 to 12 per cent. for capital and compete successfully with foreign goods and wares manufactured with capital at 3 to 4 per cent. without any reduction in the wages of our labor. Now, to show that neither of these policies offers any sufficient remedy for the evils complained of, we will suppose the proposition of the Government to be accepted and the enterprise entered upon, and that the company make a net profit of 7 per cent. per annum over and above seamen's wages, repairs, insurance, and all other expenses, and after providing a sufficient sinking fund to maintain the line in like good repair for all time. This would doubtless be satisfactory to the English part of the company, for it is about double the average rate of interest in that country, and it ought to be equally so to the American members of the company, for it is quite double the average rate of increase in our national wealth. Let us further suppose the company to borrow the whole amount of the capital employed in the enterprise, the English members to obtain their portion at 4 per cent. and the American members to agree to pay 10 per cent. for their part.

The result would be as follows:

English company, with interest at 4 per cent.		American company, with interest at 10 per cent.
Capital stock	$6,000,000	Capital stock	$6,000,000
Profit first year	420,000	Interest first year	600,000
	6,420,000		6,600,000
Deduct interest first year	240,000	Deduct profit first year	420,000
	6,180,000		6,180,000
Profit second year	432,600	Interest second year	618,000
	6,612,600		6,798,000
Deduct interest second year	240,000	Deduct profit second year	420,000
	6,372,600		6,378,000
Profit third year	446,082	Interest third year	637,800
	6,818,682		7,015,800
Deduct interest third year	240,000	Deduct profit third year	420,000
	6,578,682		6,595,800
Profit fourth year	460,508	Deduct one vessel or share for back interest	500,000
	7,039,190		6,095,800
Deduct interest fourth year	240,000	Interest fourth year	609,580
	6,799,190		6,705,380
Profit fifth year	475,943	Deduct profit on eleven vessels for fourth year	385,000
	7,275,133		6,320,380
Deduct interest fifth year	240,000	Interest fifth year	632,038
	7,035,133		6,952,418
		Deduct profit on eleven vessels for fifth year	385,000
			6,567,418
		Deduct second vessel	500,000
			6,067,418

It will be seen that at the end of the third year the American part of the company would be in arrears for interest $595,880, and that at the same time the English members would have a profit or credit of $578,682. Under these circumstances it would be quite natural for the former to apply to the latter for a loan to help them out of their financial difficulty. But as our English friends understand the nature and power of interest much better than we do and are more in the habit of practicing sound business sense in all transactions of this nature, they would undoubtedly refuse to comply with this request. Instead of making a loan to their American partners they would be likely to propose to purchase one of their vessels or shares in the company. Being unable to do better, this proposition would be accepted, and the English colors would take the place of the American flag on one of their vessels, when the American part of the company would own but eleven and their English partners thirteen vessels of the line. As will be seen, at the end of the fifth year the American part of the company would have to part with another vessel, after which they would own but ten and the English partners fourteen. This process would have to be repeated at the end of the seventh, ninth, tenth, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth years, when the English members of the company would own all the vessels of the line and have besides a profit of $117,723, while the American partners would own none and be in arrears $6,337,151. It will, I think, be difficult for our scientific financiers and economists to account for this result on any of the theories they have heretofore advanced. The advocates of protection cannot charge it to the greater cost of labor in the construction and operation of the vessels, nor can the champions of free trade attribute it to the high duties imposed on materials and stores, for these are all excluded from the calculation. The result is due wholly to the difference in the rate of interest paid for the use of capital in the two countries, and to nothing else.

INLAND TRANSPORTATION BY RAILWAY AND OTHERWISE.

For the purpose of illustrating this branch of the subject, I will assume the actual cost of a railroad, so constructed and equipped as to have the capacity to earn $8,000 per mile yearly, to be $32,000 a mile, and that it will require 60 per cent., or $4,800, of the gross earnings to pay operating expenses. This would leave as the net earnings $3,200, or 10 per cent. of the cost. Now, with interest at 4 per cent., the cost of capital would be but $1,280 per mile. If to this be added the amount for operating expenses, as in the former case, ($4,800,) it will give as the total cost for interest on capital and operating expenses $6,080, or but 76 per cent. of the cost, with money at 10 per cent. Thus, it will be seen that, with the interest on capital one-third greater than the average rate of increase in the national wealth, and the wages of labor the same, transportation can be done for three-fourths of the cost, with interest at 10 per cent.

EFFECTS ON MANUFACTURING INTERESTS.

To illustrate this branch of the subject, I will suppose two enterprising men, familiar with all the details and in all respects well qualified for the intelligent management of the business, to engage in the manufacture of iron from the ore, and that it will require a capital of $100,000, and that they own one-half of this amount and borrow the other half at 10 per cent., principal and interest payable at the end of twenty years, with interest added to the principal yearly. I will further suppose that they make a net profit of 6 per cent. per annum, which is double the average rate of increase in the national wealth, and that they employ the profits in the extension of their works. This would make their property worth $320,628 at the end of the twenty years; but at the same time the capitalist's $50,000, the amount borrowed at 10 per cent., would amount to $336,380, leaving these business men indebted to the money-lender $15,754, being equal to but five and two-thirds months' interest on his claim. It will thus be seen that, after sinking their half of the capital employed in the enterprise and losing all reward for the service of the best part of their lives, except a mere subsistence for the time being, these business men would be left penniless, and, as society is now constituted, either charged with incompetency or denounced as swindlers, while the money-lender would, for the use of one-half of the capital, without devoting any time or attention to the business, reap all the profits of the enterprise and be regarded as an honorable member of society, if not as a "Christian banker."

Now, had these enterprising business men paid 4 instead of 10 per cent. for the use of their borrowed capital, at which it could be obtained under a just monetary system, the result would have been as follows: The product of the $100,000 invested in the business would, as in the former case, be $320,628, while the capitalist's $50,000, or half of the capital, would amount to but $109,602, leaving the business men $211,026 for their services and profits on half of the capital employed in the business. But it may be objected that twenty years is too long a period, and to meet this objection I will give the result at the end of ten years. In this case the $100,000 invested in the business for ten years would amount to $179,085, and the capitalist's $50,000, at 10 per cent., would amount to $129,710, which, under a foreclosure of a mortgage or sale under a trust deed, in a monetary crisis such as we are now experiencing, and which is certain to occur under like circumstances, would take the whole property and turn the business men out bankrupt. I have assumed that the business men owned half the capital, first, for the reason that one-half the property or wealth of the nation is owned by a small percentage of the population, who loan their money or rent their property to the industrial, enterprising classes, and, second, because those who demand and receive 8 to 10 per cent. for loanable capital require security to double the amount loaned. Now what is true in the cases given will apply to our agricultural, mining, and all other useful industries, as well as to our commercial interests.

INTEREST THE ROOT OF THE EVIL.

It might seem that I had elaborated this subject of interest beyond proper bounds, but I think the necessity for presenting it in these various aspects will be admitted when it is considered that but few, if any, even among those who are regarded as authority on the subject, seem to have a clear comprehension of the power of interest or of the relative effects of the different rates in the distribution of the products of labor. I am persuaded that a careful examination of this subject will convince any candid mind that the exorbitantly high rates of interest on loanable capital, sanctioned and sustained by our present iniquitous monetary laws, is the main, and is of itself a sufficient, cause for all our industrial, commercial, and financial troubles, and is tending, inevitably and rapidly, to the impoverishment and degredation of the producing classes and the demoralization of society generally.

It is this that has driven our merchant marine from the ocean and is the main element in the excessive cost of our inland transportation. It is this that causes our periodical monetary crises and commercial revulsions. These are but the protest of honest industry and legitimate business against demands they cannot meet and burdens they cannot bear. It is this, too, that has prevented us from developing our wonderful natural resources and from becoming industrially and financially what we are politically: self-sustaining and independent. Right here, then, we must apply the remedy; for neither subsidies to our shipping and inland transportation interests, nor protection or free trade, nor appreciation of the value of the currency, can give substantial relief so long as the present unfair standard of distribution between capital and labor remains in force.

Interest is the most dangerous, because the most insidious, of all the powers menacing the rights and prosperity of the people. Operating silently and unseen, it stealthily takes from the producing classes a large portion of their earnings, while it keeps them in ignorance of the cause of their wrongs.

I will now proceed to show that the industrial, commercial, and financial evils under which we are now suffering are the legitimate results of the delegation of the sovereign power to make money and regulate the value thereof and the gratuitous grant of the credit of the people to a vast system of private corporations.

Before entering upon the discussion of the monetary system now in operation, I will say that I regard money only as a means to an end, to wit, the reduction of the rate of interest, so as to establish an equitable standard of distribution between loanable capital and productive labor, and I will add that I have no quarrel with those who invest their means under the national-bank law. It is the system against which I war.

OUR MONETARY SYSTEMS, PAST AND PRESENT, INIMICAL TO OUR FORM OF GOVERNMENT AND INJURIOUS AND OPPRESSIVE TO ALL LEGITIMATE BUSINESS.

As the bill provides for the repeal of the national-bank acts, and the adoption of a monetary system which, it is claimed, will be more in harmony with the principles upon which our institutions are founded, I will now proceed to present a few reasons and arguments in support of the proposed change. The Constitution of the United States gives Congress full power and authority over the money of the nation; and there being no express grant of authority for the delegation of this sovereign power to any class of individuals or corporations, it becomes the imperative duty of Congress to provide the people with a circulating medium directly under the control of those who produce and distribute the property and products it is designed to represent and exchange, that they may be able to so regulate the volume and value thereof that it shall distribute property and products to capital and labor equitably, according to the service and labor performed in their production. This important duty Congress has thus far failed to perform, for our monetary laws, unlike our Government, are founded on the aristocratic idea that the few should rule the many and the many toil for the few.

The history of these laws, from the institution of the Government down to the present time, is one of repeated wrongs and usurpations, all having in direct object the subversion of our democratic republican institutions, and the establishment of a money oligarchy to rule over and despoil the wealth-producing classes of their substance, and reduce them to the condition of feudal slavery. This principle was unfortunately ingrafted into our system from ideas of money borrowed from the aristocratic governments of Europe, where property or a privileged class, and not the people, govern. Once accepting the erroneous notion that the value of money was innate, and that gold and silver were the only substances by which its legal powers could be expressed, and the quantity of these metals being found insufficient to meet the wants of a circulating medium, the founders of our Government were compelled to adopt the specie-basis fallacy. A bank was chartered by Congress, with authority to issue $3 of its promises to pay, to circulate as money, for each dollar of coin in its vaults. This was followed by like grants by the Legislatures of the several States, and in this way the entire field of circulating medium was soon "filched from the nation to whom it rightfully belonged." Clothed with this sovereign power, the managers of these irresponsible corporations were enabled to control the value and to effect the distribution of all the property in the nation, and to fix the rewards of labor in all the departments of useful occupations, callings, and professions. This power they have wielded with an eye single to their own selfish views and interests, without regard to the plainest principles of justice or the rights of those who produce and distribute the wealth and pay the taxes of the nation. They have expanded and contracted the volume of the currency, raised and lowered the rates of interest, and repudiated their promises and obligations with impunity, in defiance of law, and in every way possible made every other interest subservient to their insatiable cupidity.

Every change that has been made in our monetary laws has been at the dictation and in the interest of the bankers and usurers and those who live and thrive by monopoly and speculation. These are the only parties ever consulted by the financial agents of the Government in relation to this important subject, and when one of their schemes has exploded they have always been ready with another, and each succeeding one has proved still more unjust and oppressive to honest industry and legitimate enterprise than its antecedent—more refined in its modes of imposition and monopoly.

THE PRESENT SO-CALLED NATIONAL BANKING SYSTEM.

I say "so-called," because the institutions organized under this system are for private gain and not for the public benefit, and are founded on the same principles as the systems which preceded it, but with greatly multiplied powers and facilities for controlling the money and business interests of the nation, and taxing and oppressing the industrial classes by means of extortionate rates of interest. The present occasion does not afford the opportunity, nor is it, in my judgment, necessary, to go into an extended review of the law, as doubtless most of those interested in a reform of the currency and finances are familiar with its provisions. I shall, therefore, confine myself to the presentation of some of its more important features, which will serve to indicate its general character, and show that it is framed in the interest of the stockholders and not of the Government or people at large.

The law clothes the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States with unprecedented and dangerous powers. His control over the currency is well-nigh absolute, without check or restraint from any other department of the Government. It is only through the Secretary of the Treasury that those who are compelled to accept the promises of the banks in exchange for their property and the products of their labor, and transact their business through them, can obtain any knowledge of the solvency of the different institutions; for the Secretary or the Comptroller of the Currency, acting under him, has the sole power of choosing the time and appointing the agents to examine the associations. It is surely neither wise nor safe to place such important trusts in the keeping of any individual; for, however virtuous and wise he may be, the duties of the office are too vast and onerous for any man to properly discharge. And if the place should happen to be filled by a mercenary or corrupt officer, or if his appointees should be such, (and there are some of this character to be found in all political organizations,) their opportunities for favoring pet institutions and enriching themselves and friends at the public expense are well-nigh unlimited.

The law at first conferred on the associations organized under this system general banking powers to the extent of $300,000,000, which was afterward increased to $354,000,000, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue to the banks circulating notes to the extent of 90 per cent. of the par value of the bonds deposited to secure the redemption thereof. In this way they draw double interest on their capital; first on the bonds deposited with the Government, and second on the currency they receive and loan to the people; and, in lieu of all taxes on their circulation and on the bonds deposited to secure the redemption thereof, the banks are required to pay but ½ of 1 per cent. semi-annually on the average amount of their circulation outstanding. As all State banks and private bankers and brokers pay the same license and tax or duty on deposits as the national banks, this tax on the circulation is all the revenue the Government derives from this source that it would not receive if the currency consisted entirely of legal-tenders. And as the currency issued through the banks derives all its credit and security from the Government indorsement and is in no respect better than the legal-tenders, every dollar of the interest paid to the banks on the bonds deposited to secure the redemption of their circulation is, with the exception of the tax or duty of 1 per cent. per annum, just so much of a subsidy paid to the banks, for which the Government receives no equivalent whatever. The argument of the advocates of the system, in and out of official position, that the national and State governments derive a large revenue from the banks that they would not otherwise receive, is wholly fictitious; for, if the bonds were paid off and taken up, the capital would have to be invested in business, where it would, of course, become subject to taxation. I feel safe in saying that no species of property or capital pays so small an amount of taxes, in proportion to profits, as that invested in national banks.

This House recently resolved, with almost entire unanimity, against all subsidies. Here, then, is an opportunity for applying that principle to practice by repealing the national banking law, or by suspending the payment of the interest on the bonds deposited with the Government.

WHAT THE SYSTEM HAS COST.

Or rather, what would have been saved to the tax-payers by the issue of legal-tenders instead of the national-bank currency in the first instance. The system has been in operation nearly thirteen years, and I think it safe to assume that the circulation of the banks has averaged $320,000,000 for twelve years, and that the premium on coin averaged 25 per cent. Now, the issue of legal-tenders instead of the bank currency in the first instance would have obviated the necessity for the issue of a like amount of bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest in coin, which, after deducting the tax on circulation, would for the twelve years amount to $268,000,000 in coin, besides the cost of collection and disbursement. Again, the premium on coin having for the time named averaged 25 per cent., deducting from the aggregate of premiums the tax on circulation would give as the loss to tax-payers for the twelve years $361,000,000 in currency, or $30,000,000 annually.

Not content with these enormous profits and the unwarranted powers already secured, the bankers and bondholders demanded and, under the delusive plea of a return to specie payment, obtained the passage of the law of 14th of January, 1875, removing all restrictions on the volume of the bank currency, and providing for the retirement of the legal-tenders from circulation by converting them into interest-bearing bonds. The principal argument offered in favor of the passage of this act was that it would make banking free, but it only extended the monopoly of issuing currency to the present holders of Government bonds, for the bonds are now held at prices that make the business of issuing currency on them unprofitable to any but the present owners. The practical effect of the law will be to retire the legal-tenders from circulation, when the bankers, and a few capitalists in New York, New England, and other money centers will have control of the circulating medium of the nation, with power to expand and contract the volume and to raise and lower the rate of interest so as to make every other interest subservient to their cupidity. The Government and people will then be so completely at the mercy of the bankers and usurers, that they will be powerless to resist any demands they may make, and we shall either have a large increase in the volume of the currency with the repeal of the tax on circulation and deposits, or a further contraction and advance in the rate of interest, just as they may deem most conducive to their interests. If they should decide to adopt the former policy, we shall have an increase of the currency to at least $1,000,000,000, secured by bonds bearing not less than 5 per cent. in coin. This will impose a burden of $50,000,000 annually on the tax-payers, and if to this be added the exemption from the tax now paid on circulation and deposits, it will swell the burden to $70,000,000 yearly over what would be required if the currency were all legal-tenders. On the other hand, if they should elect to adopt that most barefaced of all frauds, the specie basis fallacy, it will not lighten the burdens of the tax-payers; for, being masters of the situation, they will select the line of policy most advantageous to themselves.

The effect of contracting the currency will be to still further reduce the wages of labor and the money value of all its productions, while the bankers and usurers will retain control of the currency or money of the nation, and maintain the rate of interest on loanable capital as high as it now is, if they do not advance it still higher. It will then take more of the labor and property of the industrial, enterprising classes, who are necessarily the borrowers or debtor class, to pay the interest and principal of their obligations. It will also increase the pay of all officers with fixed salaries, State and national; for their pay will purchase more of the products of labor at the reduced prices. It is then not strange that those who live and thrive by usury and upon fixed salaries should advocate the reduction of the price of labor and the value of productive property. If we adopt this system, we will get "hard money," but not specie redemption. The only "hard money" this system can or will furnish will be in the way of 10 per cent. for "gilt-edge" paper over the bank-counter, and one and one-half to two per cent. per month for other well-secured paper from the banker's "cellar-broker," an appendage to most of the national banks. The currency will not be put into circulation in the vicinity of the banks issuing it, so that if it were possible for the banks to redeem three to five dollars of currency with one of coin, specie redemption would be impracticable so far as the great majority of the people are concerned. But it is both a physical and moral impossibility for either the banks or the Government to perform a promise of this nature, and it is, therefore, an act of bad faith to make it. Every bank-note issued on this basis was, in the very nature of things, what the bankers and their allies style the legal-tenders, "an engraved lie." Another serious objection to the system is, that although ostensibly operated under separate management, these associations have a common interest, and, located as they are or will be at all points of any business importance, in telegraphic communication with Wall street, the center and heart of the system, they will form a complete system of espionage over the business of the whole country. With absolute control over the currency, and full knowledge of the financial condition and business of all sections, they can regulate the value of all property and products, so as to make every other interest pay tribute to them, and tax the producers and distributors of the wealth until they become as helpless as the fly in the spider's web; yes, tax the manhood out of them.

Many of our enterprising business men are now in this condition. When the bankers, bondholders and others of the money-lending classes, who are all interested in the system, once feel that it is the firmly fixed policy of the Government, no mine operator, farmer, manufacturer, or other employer of labor, or business man, who is not the avowed advocate of the system, will be able to borrow a dollar of them for any purpose. That this has been, from the inception of the scheme, and is now, the design of its authors and advocates will not be doubted by any one who has watched their course from the first.

POLITICAL INFLUENCE.

Another grave objection to this system is its demoralizing effects on those who make and administer the laws. I feel safe in saying that this single expensive and wholly useless scheme has more influence in the shaping and administration of our financial laws than all other interests combined. As I have before said, the bankers and others of the money-lending class are the only parties ever consulted in reference to this most important subject, and in giving their advice, or rather, I might say, in dictating the financial policy of the Government, they have had in view their own interest, and not that of the Government or people. These parties have not always waited for an invitation. They have been in the habit of visiting our Government officials in their private chambers, and, as evidence of their power and influence, we have seen these officials change their opinions and course of action on questions connected with our finance and currency without offering any well-founded argument, or giving any sufficient reason for such change.

The report of the Comptroller of the Currency, submitted to Congress, reads more like the argument of a bank president or an editorial in some subsidized organ of the banks than the report of a Government officer. Instead of a plain statement of facts in relation to the business of the Bureau over which he presides, it is made up of special pleadings and fictitious arguments against the legal-tenders or people's money and in favor of the banks, and a batch of tabulated flummery of no use whatever to the great mass of the people, who are taxed to pay the salary of this officer.

After showing that the average half-yearly net earnings of the banks, from 1st of March, 1869, to 1st of September, 1875, was $29,248,580, or 6.36 per cent. semi-annually, (see page 75,) on the average amount of the capital invested, which is fully five times the average rate of increase in the national wealth for the same time, he recommends that the banks be exempt from the payment of the tax on their deposits; and if this recommendation meets with favor, next year he will plead for the remission of the tax on the circulation of the banks.

Now, if the bankers are successful in their efforts to have the legal-tenders retired from circulation by converting them into interest-bearing bonds, as contemplated by the act of January 14, 1875, and the control of the currency surrendered to them, we shall soon have $1,000,000,000 of their notes in circulation, which, at the rate they have averaged up to this time, 6.36 per cent. half-yearly, will amount to $73,890,000,000 in thirty-five and one-third years. Now, estimating the present value of the national wealth at $26,000,000,000, and allowing it to increase at the rate of 3 per cent. per annum for the same time, the amount would be but $73,770,000,000. It will thus be seen that the bankers would absorb the whole wealth of the nation in a little over one generation.

The officer making this report receives a salary of $5,000 per annum from the Government, and if the bankers were generous enough to pay him in proportion to the services rendered them his salary would exceed that of the President, for his report and recommendations are certainly worth ten times as much to the banks as to the Government. What I have said in reference to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency will to a great extent apply to the reports of all the officers of the Treasury Department.

We likewise see the metropolitan press, both secular and religious, with but few exceptions, arrayed on the side of the bankers and usurers. They denounce the legal-tenders or people's money, not with arguments, but with such vulgar slang as "irredeemable trash," "engraved lies," "rag baby," and other opprobrious epithets, notwithstanding many of them have heretofore ably advocated the legal-tenders and opposed the national banking system with unanswerable arguments. In this way public opinion is manufactured and political parties controlled in the interest of the bankers and others of the money-lending class and monopolists and speculators of every kind, without regard to the rights and interests of those engaged in the useful occupations, callings, and professions. If the system is continued in force it will not be long before the halls of legislation and all other departments of the Government will be filled with stockholders, bank officers, and parties otherwise directly pecuniarily interested in this scheme. Those who produce and distribute the wealth will then have no rights the bankers and usurers will be bound to respect. I will not pursue this subject further than to say for the benefit of those who may not have examined the law for themselves that there is in the original law manifestly a studied design running through all its provisions to render the industrial and commercial interests tributary to the money power, and that every alteration and amendment that has been made in or to it has been either openly or covertly in the interest of the money-mongers.

The crowning act of deceit in this adroit management was the passage of the act of 14th of January, 1875—under the gag-rule—providing for gratuitous coinage of gold, free banking, and the redemption of legal-tenders in excess of $300,000,000 to the extent of 80 per cent. of the new bank currency issued under it, and the resumption of specie payments 1st of January, 1879. It might be inferred, as many hoped was the case, that the object of the law was to leave three hundred millions of the legal-tenders in circulation. But this was clearly not the purpose of the authors of the law, for it provides that, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to prepare and provide for the redemption of the legal-tenders after 1st of January, 1879, he shall have power to use any surplus revenue in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to sell and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, either of the descriptions of bonds of the United States authorized by act of Congress approved 14th of July, 1870, to the extent necessary to carry the resumption act into full effect. From this, I think it is manifest that it was and is the object, intent, and purpose to retire and cancel every dollar of the legal-tenders, to surrender the whole money power of the nation to the bankers and to make room for and to give exclusiveness to the circulation of the free banking begotten by it.

The bill provides for the abrogation of the law because it is, in principle, repugnant to our system of government, and because no alteration or amendment that can be made in or to it can possibly relieve it of its objectionable features. It is the principle of slavery in a new guise, and, though more subtle and refined, it is scarcely less unjust and oppressive to the industrial classes than the old system of chattel slavery was to its victims, and, like that, it must be utterly abolished before the natural rights of the wealth-producing classes can be established on firm and enduring basis.

If this oligarchy lives the Republic must perish, for "whoever holds the money-bags governs the people."

To restore general and permanent prosperity to our industrial and commercial interests, to encourage the development of our abundant natural resources, and to enable us, as a nation, to become industrially, commercially, and financially, as we are politically, self-sustaining and independent, we must utterly abolish this pernicious system of banking, and establish a monetary system conformable and concurrent with the principles of justice and equality upon which our institutions are founded.

As we must have, as has been shown, a monetary system, it is not enough to show that the present one is wrong, but it is equally important and necessary to offer a better one. To this end I propose

THE AMERICAN MONETARY SYSTEM.

A circulating medium being indispensable to a free and convenient exchange of property and products, it is not enough to show that the system in operation is wrong in principle and practice, but it is necessary to offer one more correct in principle and better adapted to the end in view. This brings me to the consideration of the second proposition in the bill. Sections 9 to 11, inclusive, provide for the issue of Treasury certificates in payment of the debts and current expenses of the Government, which certificates shall be a legal-tender in payment of all debts, public and private, (except when it is provided that payment shall be made in coin,) and interconvertible, at the option of the holder, with registered Government bonds bearing such equitable rate of interest as will distribute property and products to labor and capital according to the labor or service performed in production. In treating this subject we must bear in mind that under our system of Government the people are sovereign; that all power is inherent in and emanates from them; and that the power to make money and regulate its value, or to declare what shall constitute the circulating medium and be a tender in the payment of debts, is an essential attribute of sovereignty. We must also keep in view the further but not less important fact that money is the medium of distribution to capital and labor, the rate of interest on loanable capital determining what proportion of the joint productions of capital and labor shall be awarded to capital for its use and what to the laborers for their services. And further, that all interest paid for the use of capital for any purpose whatever must, in the end, be borne by labor, and is as much a charge on it as the taxes paid for the support of the Government.

IT IS CLAIMED FOR THIS SYSTEM.

1. That it is adapted to our theory of government and in harmony with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, which clothes Congress with plenary powers over the currency or money of the nation, and charges it with the duty of providing the people with a safe and convenient circulating medium, adequate to the demands of the industrial and commercial interests.

2. That it would restore the power over the currency to the nation, to whom it belongs, but which has been filched from it by banking corporations, and provide the people with a medium of exchange directly under the control of those who produce and distribute the property it is designed to represent and exchange, and in which each citizen would be interested to the extent of his wealth or the amount of property he might have to exchange, and have a corresponding influence in its management and regulation.

3. That it would be just in its bearings on all classes and interests as well as to all sections of the country. Under its operation the currency or money would, without any legal enactment regulating its distribution, naturally flow to the section of the country and into the pockets of the individuals producing the wealth, and not, as under the present system, to the money centers and into vaults of the banks and the pockets of the usurers, whither it is attracted by extortionate rates of interest.

4. That it would be self-adjusting and possess the elasticity necessary to adapt it to the ebb and flow of trade; for if, at any time, the amount in circulation should be insufficient to meet the demands of legitimate business, the rate of interest would advance, which would cause the bonds to be exchanged for currency. On the other hand, should the volume in circulation be in excess of the demands of trade and the rate of interest in ordinary business transactions fall to or below the rate paid on the Government bonds, the currency would be converted into bonds to the extent necessary to restore the proper equilibrium. Thus it would prevent all violent expansions and contractions of the volume of the currency as well as the high and fluctuating rates of interest on loanable capital which have in the past proven and must, so long as the present system is continued in operation, prove detrimental to all useful industry and legitimate enterprise.

5. That it would establish an equitable standard of distribution to capital and labor, which is the most important function of a circulation medium, or rather of a monetary system. With the rate of interest on the Government bonds sufficiently below the rate of increase in the national wealth by productive industry to make an equitable division of the joint earnings of money or non-producing capital and labor, those who produce and distribute the wealth would receive a fair compensation for their services and capital a just reward for its use.

6. That it would furnish an honest currency and gives us a specie standard, for, when once fairly in operation, the bonds, into which the currency would be convertible at the will of the holder, would command the coin in the open market, and the currency would, of course, be par with coin. This the specie-basis fallacy never did, nor never can do, for it is an impossibility for either the banks or the Government to redeem $4 to $6 of circulation with $1 of coin; and the parties making this promise, whether it be the bankers or the Government, know that they cannot fulfill it in good faith, and it is, therefore, an act of dishonesty to make it.

7. That, resting, as it would, on public faith, which is the basis upon which our Government is founded, and being endowed by law with all the attributes of money, it would have a permanent value and uniform credit, and perform all the functions of a circulating medium, equally as well as coin—better, because more convenient and economical.

8. Advantageous as this system would be to the Government and people in an economical point of view, it would be equally important and desirable as a political measure. As upon the perpetuity of the Union of the States depends, in a great measure, the success of the republican principle of Government, it should be the pride as it is the duty of all good citizens to subordinate mere personal interests and advantages to the attainment of this one grand object.

In dealing with this subject we must not lose sight of the fact that the mere abstract principle of political freedom is not, of itself, sufficient to secure the people in their rights and bind their affections to the Government. My deliberate judgment is that, with our varieties of climate and diversified productions and interests, it will be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to permanently maintain and perpetuate the Union of the States without some common bond of interest, which it is claimed the proposed monetary system will furnish. The currency would go into the possession of every citizen in the nation, even to the child who owned but a dime, and, if the bonds were issued in denominations as low as $25, they would afford the most safe and convenient form of investment for the means of the working classes, who constitute much the larger portion of our population. And as the value of both these classes of security would depend entirely upon the stability of the Government and the perpetuity of the Union, and as the system would greatly increase the rewards of labor in all branches of useful occupations, it would tend to attach the affections of the citizens of all classes and sections to the Government and unite them in one harmonious whole.

It is claimed by the advocates of the present monetary system that our national debt will prove a source of strength to the Government. This will, however, depend largely upon how it is managed. If it is distributed among the people, either in the form of currency or bonds of small denomination bearing such rate of interest as will not be oppressive to the industrial classes, it will undoubtedly have this effect and tend to strengthen the bonds of Union; but, if it is retained in the hands of a few bankers and other capitalists, it will just as certainly prove a source of weakness. It should be, then, the first care, as it is the highest duty, of the Representatives of the people to so manage the debt and currency as to lighten the burdens of the producing classes and to interest pecuniarily the greatest possible number in the preservation and perpetuity of the Union. This is the object that the advocates of the system of bonds and currency, interconvertible at the pleasure of the holder, have in view, and which they believe would accomplish this desirable end without doing injustice to any class or portion of the people.

The bill provides for the issue of registered bonds and that the volume of the currency shall not be reduced below $20 per capita of the population. The first of these provisions is to prevent the bonds from circulating as money and the second to prevent the contraction of the volume of the currency below what would afford an easy-working money market. The bill also provides that the bonds shall draw lawful interest and reserves to Congress the right to change the rate when in its judgment the public welfare will be promoted thereby

The object of this provision is to place the money or circulating medium of the nation under the direct control of the people through their Representatives in Congress. This will or can do no injustice to the holders of the bonds, for, if they should be dissatisfied with the change in the rate of interest, or if they should be able to employ their means so as to yield a greater income than that derived from the bonds, they would have ample time to present them for redemption before the law would take effect.

THE RATE OF INTEREST THE KEY TO THE SYSTEM.

As the rate of interest on the Government securities would, under this system, govern the rate in all business transactions, and as the bonds would be the most desirable and convenient form of investment, they would be preferred to other securities even at a somewhat lower rate of interest. It follows that the rate on them should be below, rather than above, the average rate of increase in the national wealth by productive industry. If greater, the effect would be to absorb too large a portion of the loanable capital; and to advance the rate of interest beyond the point where capital could be surely and profitably employed in legitimate business. This would defeat the end sought to be attained by the advocates of the system, which is to establish a fair and uniform rate of interest and an equitable standard of distribution to capital and labor. I have, as I believe, shown conclusively that the average rate of increase in the national wealth does not exceed 3 per cent. per annum. This is therefore, in my judgment, the highest rate that should be allowed on the bonds. Even at this rate capital, when it co-operates with labor in the production of property, will absorb all the surplus earnings and compel the laborers to work for a mere subsistence. I am aware that there are those who have given much patient thought and careful examination to this subject, and who as earnestly favor the object in view as I do, who favor 3.65 as the rate of interest on the Government bonds. The argument advanced in favor of this rate is the convenience in calculating the interest; but I do not think this sufficient to justify the additional burden it would impose on the business interests. Besides, if the rate on the bonds be fixed at 3 per cent., the rate in legitimate business would probably settle at 3.65, and there would be a thousand calculations in business transactions for one on the bonds.

It must be borne in mind that high interest on money or loanable capital means low wages and long hours of toil for labor. It also means painful anxiety in the day-time and sleepless nights for business men and borrowers.

ADVANTAGES TO THE GOVERNMENT IN THE LIQUIDATION OR REMOVING THE BURDENS OF THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The debt, exclusive of the legal-tenders now in circulation, is, in round numbers, $1,800,000,000, and the coin-interest $100,000,000 annually. In the treatment of this branch of the subject, the first question to be determined is the amount of circulation necessary for the transaction of the business of the country. I am aware that there is a wide difference of opinion on this point, and that we have no reliable data by which the amount can be ascertained with entire accuracy. All will, however, agree that it will require a much larger amount than under the old specie-basis fallacy, when the farmers and others of the producing classes, because of the insecurity of its paper, preferred to deposit in some wild-cat institution rather than keep it in their possession over night. Those parties, having entire confidence in the Government money, would retain a much larger amount of it in their possession to meet future obligations.

Again, with a full volume of currency and a fair and uniform rate of interest, all branches of productive industry would revive and continue prosperous, and most of the ordinary business transactions would be for cash. I therefore think it safe to estimate that as much as $22.75 per capita would remain permanently in circulation. Our population is now, in round numbers, forty-four millions, which, at $22.75 per capita, would make the circulation $1,000,000,000. The legal-tenders and fractional currency now in circulation is four hundred and twenty millions. This, deducted from the one thousand millions of currency, would leave five hundred and eighty millions to be supplied by an additional issue of legal-tenders after the bank currency shall be retired from circulation. To keep the volume of the currency uniform would require it to be increased in a like ratio with the increase of the population, wealth, and business of the country, which I have estimated at 3 per cent. per annum.

Now, if the five hundred and eighty millions and the increase in the currency for the first year, amounting to $30,000,000, (total, $610,000,000,) be applied to the payment of the interest-bearing debt of the Government, as the same shall become due and redeemable, at the pleasure of the Government, it will, with the premium on coin at 13 per cent., (the present rate,) take up five hundred and forty millions, nearly, of the 6 per cent. bonds. This deducted from the total debt, $1,800,000,000, will leave, to bear interest the second year, $1,260,000,000, the rate of interest on which will average 5 per cent. per annum, or $63,000,000 for the second year. The amount of coin required to pay the interest on the remaining portion of the debt will be so small, that I think it safe to assume that the premium would not average over 10 per cent. Then, if we continue to raise by taxation the $100,000,000 now required to pay the interest on the debt and add to it the increase in the currency for the second year, amounting to $30,900,000, (total, $130,900,000,) and invest the balance after paying the annual interest on the debt in bonds at 10 per cent. premium, it will take up $61,727,000 of the debt, leaving to bear interest for the third year $1,198,273,000, the interest on which will be $59,914,000.

The increase in the currency for the third year would be $31,287,000; add $100,000,000 raised by taxation—total $131,827,000; deduct $59,714,000, interest on the debt for the third year, and it will leave $72,913,000 to apply on the payment of the principal of the debt, which, with coin at 10 per cent. premium, will take up $66,248,000 of the principal of the debt, leaving to bear interest the fourth year $1,131,989,000. As the system would by this time be fairly established, and the business of the country accommodated to it, I think it safe to assume that the currency would be at par. The interest on the debt for the fourth year would be $56,599,450—total, principal and interest of the debt at the end of the fourth year, $1,188,588,450. Increase in the currency for the fourth year, $32,728,810; add the $100,000,000 raised by taxation—total $132,728,810; this, deducted from the amount of the principal and interest of the debt, will leave to bear interest for the fifth year $1,055,805,640. Then if we continue to raise by taxation the amount now required to pay the interest on the public debt, say $100,000,000 annually, and add to it the annual increase of the currency, and invest the balance after paying the annual interest on the debt in Government bonds at par, the whole interest-bearing debt would be liquidated in fourteen years, leaving in circulation at the end of that time $1,512,000,000, which would bear the same relation to the population and business interests of the country that the $1,000,000,000 does at the present time, and would always be needed for a circulating medium, and required to be increased thereafter in a like ratio with the increase of the population and business of the country.

Again, this system would afford the most safe and convenient form of investment for the means of the working classes, now deposited in savings-banks, as well as for others having idle funds, to meet future obligations. The certainty of being able to get their funds when wanted would induce all these classes to invest their means in the Government securities at much lower rates of interest than are usually promised, but not always paid, by the class of institutions named. I have not the data to enable me to determine the amount of the Government bonds that would be taken up in this way, but I think it safe to assume that it would absorb a sufficient amount to enable the Government to liquidate its bonds now outstanding even in much less time than I have named. Thus the burden of our national debt would soon be greatly lessened, and its securities brought into the hands of our own citizens. There would then be no necessity for expensive syndicates, nor for disposing of the national securities in foreign markets at sixty-five cents on the dollar as compared with the credit of the English government, and this is just what we are doing. The English consol bears 3 per cent., and is usually worth in the open market ninety-two and a half cents on the dollar, which is equal to 3¼ per cent. on the investment; and $65 invested in our 5 per cent. bonds will yield as large an increase as $100 invested in the English securities.

Now let us see how the matter will stand in case the bankers are successful in their efforts to have the legal-tenders or people's money retired by converting them into untaxed interest-bearing bonds, and the control of the circulating medium surrendered to them. This would increase the interest-bearing debt to $2,200,000,000, which, with interest at 5 per cent. added to the principal, would amount to $4,356,000,000 in the fourteen years; while the yearly payment of $100,000,000, with the interest added yearly, would amount to but $1,960,000,000; add amount of legal-tenders in circulation at the end of fourteen years, $1,512,000,000, making $3,472,000,000 for the fourteen years. This, deducted from the $4,356,000,000—the cost under the bankers' plan—will leave, as the gain to the tax-payers by the adoption of the proposed system, $884,000,000 in the fourteen years. This calculation is on the assumption that the legal-tenders would be a debt in the same sense as the bonds are; but as they draw no interest, and would always be needed as a circulating medium, the difference between these plans would really be $2,396,000,000 in the fourteen years.

This system will provide in a double degree means of relief, benefit, and welfare to the people, giving the best currency that can be devised, with all the constituents of soundness, convenience, and value, equal and uniform to the very limits of the authority under which it is issued, guaranteed by the renewed strength of the Government and by revived prosperity which it will inspire and sustain; and, while based upon the faith of the people, it will diminish and lighten the burden of their debt in the exact measure of its volume, substituting double benefit to the tax-payers in the place of double interest to the bankers.

BENEFITS TO THE INDUSTRIAL AND COMMERCIAL INTERESTS.

If, as it should be, the public domain were reserved for actual settlers only, the loanable capital released by the payment and conversion of the interest-bearing securities of the Government into currency, as proposed, would have to be employed in some branch of productive industry or legitimate enterprise at lower rates of interest. This would revive our industries and give employment at remunerative wages to tens of thousands of laborers now in enforced idleness, as well as facilitate and cheapen the exchange of our productions.

To show more clearly the depressing effects of the present unreasonable and unnecessary rates of interest maintained on loanable capital by vicious legislation on the industrial and commercial interests, and the benefits to result to the producers and distributors of the wealth from a fair and uniform rate, I will assume that one-half, or $13,000,000,000, of the national wealth is owned by the capitalists who loan their money or rent their property to the industrial classes, and that the rate of interest which governs the value and rent of property averages as much as 8 per cent. per annum. Now, if the proposed monetary system be adopted, I think it safe to assume that interest will fall to 4 per cent. on long loans with undoubted security, which is what manufacturers and other business men most need; the effect of which is shown by the following statement: The interest on thirteen billion dollars at 8 per cent. would amount to $1,040,000,000; while, at 4 per cent. the interest would amount to but $520,000,000; making a net annual saving to the business classes of $520,000,000, being equal to $1,664,000 for each secular day in the year; and I repeat, that all interest paid for the use of capital must in the end fall on labor, and is just as much a charge on it as the taxes paid for the support of the Government.

The bill also provides that the Treasury certificates or currency shall be a legal tender in payment of debts, public and private, contracted after its passage, and for all existing debts except the interest and that portion of the principal of the Government debt which is by the laws under which it was contracted payable in coin, and that the Government shall purchase with the lawful money or interest-bearing bonds the coin necessary to meet the payment of these exceptions. It may be objected that this would advance the premium on coin, and thereby subject the Government to loss; but I think it will be found that this objection is not well founded. I have estimated that $540,000,000 of principal of the debt would be liquidated at the end of the first year, leaving to bear interest but $1,260,000,000, and that the rate of interest would not exceed 5 per cent., or $63,000,000 annually. The diminished demand for coin would tend to lower the premium, so that I think it safe to assume that at the end of the third year the currency would be at par. Then if our now outstanding bonds were not due, and the holders should demand an exorbitant premium on them, we could suspend the collection of taxes beyond what might be required to meet the current expenditures of the Government until the bonds became due and payable at their face value. There is one circumstance bearing on this point which the bankers and other opponents of a Government currency issued directly to the people, without the intermediate agency of any system of banks, are careful to keep out of view, which is the issue of the first series of demand Treasury notes, $50,000,000 of which were issued in August, 1861, and afterward increased to sixty millions. These notes passed at par with coin, or nearly so, until the following December, at which time the Government and banks suspended specie payments, when they immediately began to depreciate in value as compared with coin, (the only lawful money then in circulation,) and continued to decline until Congress, in February, 1862, made them receivable for duties on imports, when they immediately rose to par with coin, and remained so ever afterward. The common-sense way and the only way to make and maintain one currency at par with another, is to endow it with equal legal powers in the payment of debts.

OBJECTIONS ANSWERED; NO GOVERNMENT BANKING OR UNDUE INFLATION OF THE CURRENCY.

There are those who profess to believe that the object is to embark the Government in the business of general banking, and to issue legal-tenders ad infinitum. But I will say to all this class of objectors that there is no cause of alarm on either of those points. The object of the advocates of the proposed monetary system is to prevent such a condition of things as the objection seems to deprecate and from which we are now suffering. The system contemplates nothing of the kind nor can it possibly be productive of any such results, for there is not one principle or even feature of banking about it. But, on the contrary, the object is to confine the Government to the exercise of its constitutional prerogative of stamping or coining money, and to divorce it from all connection with any species of banking, direct or remote, as well as from all other business, except what may be necessary to its preservation and perpetuity. There is nothing in the system which proposes or permits the loaning of $1 by the Government to any individual or corporation on any kind of security, or the issuing of any currency except in payment of its lawful debts.

The proposition is just this: That the Government shall discharge all its moneyed obligations, whether for supplies furnished, services rendered, or for any purpose whatever, except when it has been provided that payment shall be made in coin, in lawful money, or interest-bearing bond, at the option of the creditor, giving the holders of either class of securities the right to exchange the one for the other at pleasure. This would leave each individual at liberty to judge for himself how he would employ his own means, whether in the lawful money or interest-bearing bond of the Government. As not a dollar could get into circulation until the Government had received an equivalent for it, it is difficult to see how the volume of the currency could be unduly expanded or exceed the needs of the business interests. So long as the money could be loaned on good security or employed in legitimate business to yield its owner a greater income than could be derived from investment in the Government securities it would, of course, be preferred to the interest-bearing bond, but when this could not be done the bond would be preferred. In other words, the proposition is to submit the whole question of currency to the people, and if they have not the intelligence to decide it for themselves without the interference of a few interested bankers and cunning financiers, there are certainly many other questions they would be less qualified to determine, and our republican institutions must prove a failure and universal suffrage a delusion.

It is the bankers and bullionists who are obnoxious to the charge of inflationists. The specie-basis fraud, through which they propose to furnish and regulate the currency, contemplates the issuing of four to six dollars of currency for each dollar of coin held for its redemption; so that the people will have to accept the promise of the bankers for the redemption of three-fourths to five-sixths of the currency, a promise that, if they were ever so well disposed, it would, in the very nature of things, be impossible for them to fulfill; and it is well known that they have not in the past been disposed to regard their obligations when it was not their interest to do so. Besides, their system encourages the inflation of the currency to the whole extent of the national debt by offering the bond-holders the opportunity of drawing double interest on their capital. But what is still more objectionable in their system is that it places the control of the circulating medium in the hands of the bankers and usurers, with power to expand and contract its volume and "inflate" the rate of interest on loanable capital at pleasure. This is the kind of "inflation" that robs labor, paralyzes enterprise, and deranges commerce, but of which you never hear the bankers, usurers, and their allies complain. I include the bullionists with the bankers, because, while opposing the Government currency, they do not advocate a purely metallic medium of exchange; consequently, whether wittingly or unwittingly, their influence is in favor of the specie-basis fallacy.

NO REPUDIATION.

Again, the bankers and their confederates, with that portion of the public press they have been able to subsidize, raise the cry of repudiation, and say, however desirable the system of an exclusive Government currency might be, it cannot be reduced to practice without impairing public faith. But this charge has no foundation in fact. If I believed that the proposed system could not be introduced without violating any legal, equitable, or moral obligation of the Government I would abandon it at once and forever, and, so far as I know, the other advocates of the system would do likewise.

The advocates of the proposed system hold that, no matter what amount of wrong and injustice may have been done or how much the representatives of the people may have erred or betrayed their constituents in the creation of the debt, it must be discharged in strict accordance with the letter and spirit of the laws under which it was contracted. But believing as they do, that the present monetary system and general financial policy of the Government are doing great injustice to the industrial classes in all departments of useful occupations, they demand a change for the future. But in making this change they propose to recognize and respect the rights of all, and to leave all in the possession of their present property, with the right to increase their wealth by honest industry and the employment of their means in legitimate business.

I assert without fear of successful contradiction that, upon careful examination, it will be found and admitted by all candid minds that it is the authors and advocates of the present system who are chargeable with the crime of repudiation; for it was the legal-tenders which they are trying in every possible way to discredit that sustained the credit of the Government and enabled it to maintain the Union, without which the interest-bearing obligations of the Government would have proved valueless. Through their influence the contract between the tax-payers and the holders of the Government securities has been changed so as to greatly increase the burdens of the former and the profits of the latter. But the advocates of the banking system ask with an air of triumph, Do you propose to pay the national debt and provide the people with a currency by merely printing pictures? I reply that the debt must be represented by some kind of pictures, either lawful money or interest-bearing bonds, and the people must have a circulating medium to facilitate the exchanges of their property and products, which, as well as the bonds, should bear the impress of national authority.

Now, the system of a legal-tender currency contemplates two machines to be run under the direction of the sovereign people: one for printing pictures bearing a just rate of interest and the other for printing pictures declared lawful money. If the Government is indebted to A in the sum of $1,000, and he desires the obligation discharged in lawful money, the greenback machine is put into operation, and if it owes B a like amount, and he prefers the interest-bearing picture, the bond machine is set in motion. This system respects the rights of the tax-payers and recognizes the capacity of the people for self-government. The bankers' system likewise contemplates two machines to be run under the direction of the bankers and usurers: one for printing pictures bearing bankrupting rates of interest, payable in coin and exempt from taxes of all kinds, into which they propose to convert the legal-tenders now in circulation, the other for providing a circulating medium by printing "engraved lies," to be doled out to the people through the banks at a cost of 6 to 8 per cent. per annum over legal-tenders, issued directly to the people. This system disregards the rights of the tax-payers and ignores the capacity of the people for self-government; it is a cheat and a fraud—nothing more, nothing less.

Again, the attorneys and other advocates of the banks say that the Supreme Court of the United States decided the legal-tender act unconstitutional in time of peace. It will, however, be found that the court has rendered no such decision. The substance of the decision bearing on this point was that the mode or manner of providing the means for the maintenance of the Government was a legislative and not a judicial question; and as it is as much the duty of Congress to provide the means for maintaining the Government in time of peace as in time of war, its powers must be the same in both cases. This is common sense as well as common honesty.

Another charge made by these parties against the legal-tenders is that by their issue in the first instance the public debt was greatly increased. This, like all the other charges, is false. The Government creditors had the privilege of taking a 6 per cent. coin-interest bond int he first place, with the right to convert the currency into bonds at pleasure. It was then the bonds, and not the legal-tenders, that were the standard of the Government credit; consequently we would have had to issue just as many bonds on the gold basis as on the currency basis.

WHAT HAS BEEN SHOWN.

It has been shown in what I have said, and, if we accept the Decalogue and Davies' arithmetic as authority, I believe fully proven—

First, that the rate of increase in the national wealth is not above 3 per cent. per annum.

Second, that the great centralization of money and wealth, in bonds and other forms of capital—withdrawing and withholding it from natural channels of industry and business, leaving them deprived of currency and to shrink and collapse—is due wholly to the present rate of interest, and that its exorbitance is the main, and is of itself a sufficient, cause for all our industrial, commercial, and financial disasters, and cannot be maintained without periodic recurrence of those results.

Third, that the depression in our industries and commerce is the natural and inherent effect of the delegation to private corporations of the sovereign power to make money and regulate the rate of interest. Public evil was planted in the very nature of the grant, was inevitable, and is now brought home to all the relations and interests of labor and business in disturbance, defeat, and ruin.

Fourth, that the so-called national banking system is founded on the same principle as the banking systems which went before it, but with greatly increased powers over the money of the country and facilities for enriching the few at the expense of the many; that, at the rate of interest or profits derived from capital invested under the system, thus far $1,000,000,000, or 4 per cent. of the wealth of the nation so invested or so favored, would swallow up the other 96 per cent., with the additions made thereto by the labor of forty millions of people in one generation, or in thirty-five years.

Fifth, that the proposed system is in harmony with the principles of justice, of equal and common right, and with common sense, upon which our institutions are founded; that it would place the circulating medium under the control of the people, to whom it of right belongs, and compel money or loanable capital to co-operate with industry and enterprise in the development of our resources and the production of wealth on equitable terms.

Sixth, that without any additional taxation it would discharge or remove the burden of the public debt in fourteen years, and at the same time provide the people with a safe, adequate, and convenient currency; and that, by the reduction in the rate of interest on loanable capital consequent upon the influence of the system, it would relieve the industrial and producing classes from the payment of over one million and a half of dollars daily to the money-lenders, now unjustly and unnecessarily extorted from them under the adverse powers and tendencies and the double-interest subsidy of the existing system.

THE ISSUE.

The issue is not between gold and legal-tenders, but whether our currency shall consist of all bank-circulation, doled out to the people by a combination of corporations at exorbitant rates of interest, or of legal-tenders, issued directly to the people in the payment of the debts and current expenditures of the Government. The issue admits of no compromise; for, upon the result depends the question whether we are to have a Goverment of the people or a money oligarchy. It is one of the strongest convictions of my life that, upon its decision, are suspended the fate of our civilization and the destiny of the country.

THE TARIFF.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Speaker, the currency is the all-engrossing subject before Congress and the country. It has been the chief topic of discussion for more than two years, and its solution is as deeply veiled today as at any time in the past. There is another subject that impresses me as equally important, if not of superior importance to the currency, and one that, in my opinion, has exercised a more potent influence in prostrating our business, deranging our industries, paralyzing our labor, and bringing distress to our people, than the depreciation of the currency and perhaps all other vicious agencies combined. This potent evil wears, most unfitly, the charmed name of protection. In 1861, after other commercial peoples had renounced it, the Congress of the United States opened its arms and took to its bosom this impersonation of all political heresies. Under the influence of its glittering sophistries it imposed restrictions the most onerous and oppressive ever imposed by the Government upon its commerce except alone the tariff of 1828, and that aroused such a feeling of indignation as seriously to threaten a civil war. Nor did it subside till Congress relieved it of its obnoxious features and made it a tariff for revenue only.

There may be good reasons why the Morrill tariff should not have been subjected to harsh criticism at the time of its passage. The country was then plunging into the whirlpool of the most gigantic civil war, and the Government required enormous revenues to carry it on. But we are not engaged in war now, and have not been for ten years, and there can be no good reason for continuing such restrictions upon our foreign commerce and at such ruinous sacrifices to our own people. The pernicious effects of that tariff were not felt during the war as they are now and have been since its termination. The laws of war changed the direction of commerce and caused it to flow in different channels from those in which it flowed in peace. The Government became the chief consumer of all the products of the country, and kept in active operation all departments of business. While the war continued, all the products of labor found a ready market in the Government, and a customer who paid high prices, who was never straitened for means with which to purchase; for, in the exercise of its sovereignty, rightfully or wrongfully, it made its own money and enforced its circulation. In 1865 the war ended and the Government retired from the market and left the country in the hands of the tariff, to employ its labor, defray its current expenses, begin the extinguishment of its national debt, and resume, if it could, its former progress in national and individual prosperity. More than a million men discharged from the Army were converted from consumers into producers. The currency began to contract its volume, and with it the value of all commodities that it measured, thereby lessening the ability of the people to pay the immense debt, national, state, county, city, and private; for amidst all the ebbings and flowings of the currency and the rising and falling of values the debt remained the same.

In this condition of the country, with these immense burdens to be discharged by the laboring millions, it seems to me it would have been wise in the Government, to have afforded every facility to its people to increase their wealth as rapidly as possible, by exchanging the products of their labor in markets where they could obtain the highest prices for their own, and purchase such as they needed at the lowest. But an odious tariff, kept up in the interest of a few favorites, built a Chinese wall around the country, and excluded the people from the markets of the world, compelling them to exchange the products of their labor in markets protected against competition, and where they had to give a greater amount of their products for the same article wanted; thus increasing the already enormous burden, by annihilating a large portion of the value of their commodities, with which they were to extinguish the debt, support themselves and families, and improve their condition in life. It not only annihilated a large portion of the value of all products of labor not protected by the tariff, but it also transferred by force of law a large portion of the earnings of the masses out of their pockets and into the pockets of the few capitalists engaged in manufactures. It could only be a question of time when this process of rapid reduction would culminate in the entire prostration of business. The point was eventually reached when confidence disappeared and the carnival of distrust and suspicion began. Capitalists withdrew their money from circulation, ceased to invest, and locked it in their vaults, where it is to-day, and where it will remain till confidence is again restored. In the mean time all the industries of the country are stretched in exhaustion, wages are sinking, strikes occurring, the fires of machinery are shutting off, tramps crowding the highways, people fleeing the country, destitution and want stalking through the land, while from every hovel of the poor, hunger lifts its appeals for bread. Strong, able-bodied men, with stout hearts and willing hands, are standing about their wretched hearth-stones and discussing with their helpless ones the terrible problem of starvation.

Under this terrible ordeal the laboring masses have been quiet and obedient to the Government, when they could have risen in their might and shaken the whole fabric of society from turret to foundation-stone. They have submitted with heroic resignation while a large portion of the price of their labor has been taken from them in the name of protection. They have given their veins to the beaks of the vultures that their blood might be drawn for the gratification of the lust of their spoilers. They have been soothed into repose by the music of treacherous charmers, who have been singing to them so sweetly about home markets, and home products, and home industry, till, like the fabled mariners of old, they have been drawn upon the enchanted rocks, where they have stranded and gone down. There is an euphony about that word protection that charms most of us, and, when associated with home, it is well calculated to lull us into sleep even at a time when the greatest peril besets us. Spoliation, when it relies for support on public opinion, always dons the virtuous gown and points all its aims in the public good. When Ahab coveted the rich vineyard of Naboth, in order to obtain it for himself he found it necessary to outlaw his subject from all sympathy with his fellows, and he had him charged with disloyalty—a diplomacy not entirely out of date in these virtuous times—and having isolated the unhappy wretch, and drawn around himself the support of the public opinion he had created, sent forth and slew him and then laid his regal hand in spoil upon his estate. When Demetrius heard Saul of Tarsus preaching that those were not gods that were made with hands, he felt that his "infant manufactures" were endangered by such a doctrine, and in his devotion to the religion of the Ephesian goddess cried for two mortal hours, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." In doing this he only sought to protect his manufacture of shrines, for, as he said very frankly to his workmen, "by this craft we have our wealth." If this foreigner were permitted to establish a belief among the people that his shrines were not gods his occupation was gone. He therefore opposed with all his might the introduction of this free-trade religion among his home industries. The doctrine of protection to one's own pocket by silencing all opposition to the schemes by which it is filled is not a new one in this age. All along the ages mankind have seen and felt the potency of that mode of argumentation that charms the senses by illusions, while it leads men to their injury and sometimes to their ruin.

Commerce has always been one of the great promoters of civilization and wealth, and all experience shows that nations have increased in wealth as they have extended their commerce.

The policy of every people should be to remove all obstructions to commercial intercourse and offer every facility to trade between themselves and others. The surplus products of every State must go abroad to hunt markets that offer the highest prices for them. That highest price is always found where the article is most wanted, and the lowest price where it is the least wanted. The surplus products of the United States are invited to the foreign market by the wants of the people there, and for that reason they will realize to the producer more money in the foreign market than at home. It is to the interest of both the individual and the State that his surplus products shall go abroad and be sold to the purchaser that will give the highest price. For the same reason it is to the interest of both the individual and the State that such products as he may want shall be purchased where they are least wanted and have their lowest price, because with the same amount of money he can purchase the greater quantity, and when it is transported to the home market, where it is most wanted, it has an increased value, and that gives increased wealth to both the individual and the State. They are both benefited doubly. They are benefited in selling the export at the highest price in the foreign market, and benefited in purchasing the import at the lowest price. How, then, can either the State or citizen receive benefit when he is compelled to sell at home at the lowest price and purchase there at the highest? How is either benefited by obstructions thrown in the way of commerce preventing the free interchange of commodities? High duties either obstruct the importation of foreign goods or they do not. If they do, they detract from the individual wealth, the national wealth, and the Government revenues. If they do not, they do not protect the home manufacturer, because they do not shield him from competition. If high duties restrict importations and cut down the revenue, to the extent of the loss of the revenue they impose additional taxation upon the people who have to supply it in some other form and when they are less able to bear it. On one or the other horn of the dilemma the manufacturer must hang.

It is true, as we learn from the fathers, that in a state of nature we are in a state of destitution, wanting almost everything for our comfort. These wants can only be supplied by labor. Between our wants and our comforts there are obstructions to be removed before our wants can be satisfied. To remove these is the office of labor, and its object is to produce the greatest results with the least effort. To increase the sum of our productions is to increase in wealth, and the less labor required to produce a given sum of productions the greater the amount of labor released to engage in the production of other values. Everything that decreases the amount of labor required to produce a given result increases the value of labor and brings more profits to the laborer, and of course more profits to the aggregated labor of the nation. And everything that increases the amount of labor required to produce a given result decreases the value of labor and brings less profits to the laborer and less aggregated wealth to the nation. If, therefore, high duties make high goods, the farmer in purchasing has to give more of the products of his labor in exchange, and the amount of labor is increased that is required to obtain them. If a farmer in Iowa or Texas has a thousand bushels of wheat which he wishes to exchange for iron, in the absence of all duties on foreign commerce he can obtain twenty-five tons of English iron in exchange, but now that the Government has placed high duties on imported iron to protect the home manufacturer he has to purchase protected iron and pay the increased price, and he finds that his thousand bushels of wheat will only buy fifteen tons in the home market. The tariff in the interest of the iron manufacturer, having imposed high duties on foreign iron, has annihilated two-fifths of the value of the wheat, and has required a larger amount of wheat to obtain the twenty-five tons of iron and increased the amount of labor required to produce it.

To illustrate the effects of protection still further, I present here a table from the report of Mr. David A. Wells for 1869:

Commodities.	Prices in 1859.	Quantities which 100 bushels of wheat would purchase in 1859.	Prices in 1869.	Quantities which 100 bushels of wheat would purchase in 1869.	Decrease per cent.

The 1,400 bushels of wheat were worth in 1859, under a free-trade tariff, $2,030 in gold, and in 1869, under a protective tariff, $1,890 in currency. A large portion of the decrease in the value of the wheat may be attributed to a depreciated currency, but the increase in the price of the products it purchases belongs to the tariff. The 1,400 bushels of wheat purchased of the same commodities in 1859 an amount more than $1,500 in excess of what it did in 1869. It had lost more than $1,500 of its purchasing power. To purchase in 1869 the same commodities that were obtained in 1859 for 1,400 bushels of wheat required 2,540 bushels, so that the value of 1,140 bushels out of 2,540 bushels had been annihilated at the thrashing-floor or transferred from the producer in the West to the manufacturer in the East. If the manufacturer can produce the articles given in exchange for the wheat and sell them as cheaply as the foreigner, then the wealth of the farmer is not lost to the nation, but only taken out of the pockets of the western farmer to be placed in the pockets of the eastern manufacturer. It disappears from the aggregated wealth of the agricultural States to appear in the wealth of the manufacturing States. If the home manufacturer cannot produce the same articles as cheaply as the foreigner, the amount necessary to enable him to do so is that much lost to both the farmer and the nation. In this system of spoliation it is impossible to tell with precision what amount of the earnings of the people are annihilated and lost to the country, and what amount is plundered for the benefit of a favored class.

The wheat-crop of the present year is over 300,000,000 bushels, more than two-thirds of which is surplus to the producers and goes into exchange for other commodities. If it has suffered the same loss in exchange that the 1,400 bushels did in 1869, in Mr. Wells's table, it has lost more than $200,000,000 in value, and it would require 360,000,000 bushels now to purchase what 200,000,000 bushels did in 1859. Two hundred million dollars lost to the wheat-growers in a a single year; in ten years, two billions! Two billion dollars contributed by the toilers of the harvest-fields to their rich neighbors to protect them against foreign paupers, and yet their generosity is not exhausted. They are still prosecuting the war for the deliverance of their American kinsmen from the power of the foreign pauper. Year by year, as they gather to their garners the fruits of their golden harvest-fields, one-third they set apart to repel the foreign pauper, while the manufacturers, with irreconcilable hate worthy of the Roman Cato, end all their discourses with "the foreign pauper must be destroyed." It will be well enough for us to consider whether we have not under the leadership of the manufacturer prosecuted our campaigns against the foreign paupers till we have almost pauperized ourselves. The wheat-growers are not the only victims of the manufacturer; the cotton-growers, whose labor produces two hundred and fifty millions a year, are in the same category, and so are all others outside of the golden circle of protection. All our people, white and black, male and female, are drawn behind the chariots of the manufacturer to adorn his triumph and to guard him against the contaminating presence of the "foreign pauper." For him the nation slays its fatted calf, and for his protection and comfort throws around his shoulders its best new robe.

Those who till the soil are an army of six million laborers, and with their families constitute more than half of our people, and create more than three-fourths of all our annual productions; but they get no protection, do not ask any, but to be let alone and permitted to enjoy the rewards of their own toil. To illustrate still further the effects of protection upon the people I present another table, showing the imports and domestic productions of twelve articles entering into consumption in the United States and their cost to the people:

EDWARD YOUNG,
Chief of Bureau.

Hon. ROGER Q. MILLS,
Member of Congress.
BUREAU OF STATISTICS, April 25, 1874.

These twelve articles are consumed by the people of the United States at a cost of one thousand nine hundred and nineteen millions. One thousand six hundred and twenty-two millions are of domestic production and two hundred and ten millions of foreign production. Upon the foreign products we pay a duty of 41.73 per cent. to the Government for its revenues, making the sum of $87,672,018.64, which, when added to the cost of the foreign product, which is $210,082,247, makes $297,754,265.64. The total cost of the domestic and foreign product to the people of the United States is $1,919,754,265.64. Upon both the domestic and foreign product we pay 41.73 per cent.: upon the former to the domestic manufacturer for protection and upon the latter to the Government for revenues. Without the protective duty of 41.73 per cent., the domestic product would have cost $945,139,400. But for the protection of the manufacturer the high duty was imposed, that he might have a monopoly of the market. The same duty of 41.73 per cent. is paid on his product, and amounts to $676,860,600. This large sum is paid in one year by the people of the United States to protect themselves against competition among manufacturers—to protect themselves against purchasing cheap goods and against high prices for their own labor. Besides these twelve articles, there are more than two thousand others upon which we pay a duty of 34⅘ per cent., amounting in round numbers to one hundred millions. If this afforded a corresponding protection to the domestic producer, the people pay on them $565,417,090. So that the one hundred and eighty-eight millions of duties collected by the Government for its revenues in 1873 cost the people in addition thereto the sum of $1,242,277,690, paid to the manufacturer for protection. This sum, enormous as it is, will not seem too extravagant when we reflect that the people of the United States consume over four thousand millions of the products of domestic manufactures every year. Such valuable protection ought to have brought the American infants to maturity some years ago, and it would seem that it had, for in 1850 and 1860 the products of manufactures were largely under those of agriculture, while in 1870, with ten years' protection, they were nearly double the products of agriculture. If we examine the censuses of 1850, 1860, and 1870, we will see some of the evidences of its retardation of the growth of national wealth. Our property in 1850, exclusive of slaves, was $5,533,623,728. In 1860 our property, exclusive of slaves, was $14,282,822,568, having increased 158 per cent. If it had continued to increase from 1860 to 1870 at the same ratio it would have been worth in gold in 1870 $37,992,308,029, but it was only $26,967,281,172, showing a loss of $11,025,026,857.

It is impossible to tell what proportion of this vast amount was the result of the war, what was the result of the plunder of the South since the war, and what the spoil of the nation by the tariff. The West and South were the chief sufferers by the war; the Eastern States increased in wealth more rapidly during and since the war than before. If we take from this sum five billions for loss by war exclusive of the slaves it seems more than the amount due to that cause. If we set down a thousand millions for the ruin and devastation left as the heritage of the carpet-bagger, we then have five billions annihilated by the tariff. If the country had enjoyed the same peace and prosperity in the second decade as in the first, and labor had received the same values for its productions, the increase of national wealth would have been continued at 158 per cent.; but as it is we are brought to look over a chasm of more than $11,000,000,000, a greater part of which is the effect of the war, of restriction on trade and commerce declared by an exorbitant tariff, and to the disorder and violence established by law and maintained by the military power of the Government in the Southern States.

Mr. Grosvenor, who has investigated the subject with great care, and ought to be good authority, in his book published in 1868, estimates the crop of 1850 at thirteen hundred millions, and the crop of 1860 at double that amount, showing an increase of 100 per cent. in the free-trade decade; and predicted then that the census of 1870, instead of showing 100 per cent. on 1860, (or $5,200,000,000,) would show a loss of an amount in one year more than sufficient to pay the whole national debt. Let the figures show how accurately that prediction has been fulfilled. The product of the crop of 1870 was, in gold, $2,195,101,935. The loss, as shown by the census, is more than three billions; the national debt less than two and a half billions. Not only has the crop not increased in the same ratio as in the free-trade decade, but it has fallen four hundred millions below the crop of 1860. And this in the face of the fact that our population had increased seven millions, our wealth ten billions, and the acreage of our farms twenty-five millions. All hail, protection! The increase of acreage in the protected decade was 15 per cent., and in the free-trade decade 44 per cent. This is the consummation of the wisdom of protection, to drive the agricultural laborer from the field to the factory, to decrease the agricultural product and increase the factory product, to decrease agricultural values and increase manufacturing values, to decrease the profits of the farm and increase the profits of the shop; and this consummation, so devoutly to be wished, is obtained by the simple process of decreasing taxation on capital and increasing it on labor. To show the effect of protection on the farm, let us compare the productions of the farm in 1860, before the war, with 1870, after the war. The census shows the value of all farm productions in 1870 to be (currency reduced to gold at 111⅑) $2,195,101,935. It does not show the value of all farm productions in 1860, but only the quantities. Taking Mr. Grosvenor's estimate, it was $2,600,000,000. Then, if we deduct from each the cost of cultivation, at $10 per acre, we have the net profits on the capital invested. The following table shows the result:

Capital invested in farms and farming implements	$6, 891, 263, 148	$8, 509, 580, 529
Value of products	2, 600, 000, 000	2, 195, 101, 935
Cost of cultivation, at $10 per acre	1, 631, 107, 200	1, 889, 210, 990
Profits	968, 892, 700	305, 895, 945
On capital invested	14 per cent.	3¼ per cent.

Three of the principal crops show the following gains from 1850 to 1860 and losses from 1860 to 1870:

	1850.	1860.	1870.
Corn, bushels	596, 071, 104	838, 792, 742	760, 944, 549
Tobacco, pounds	199, 752, 655	434, 209, 461	262, 735, 341
Cotton, bales	2, 469, 093	5, 387, 052	3, 011, 996

If these crops had increased in the protective decade as they did in the free-trade decade, or if there had been no war, no reconstruction, and no protection, we should have had, in 1870, 11,753,030 bales of cotton in lieu of 3,011,996; 1,180,520,678 bushels of corn in lieu of 760,944,549; and 943,856,564 pounds of tobacco in lieu of 262,735,341.

The loss to the national wealth on these three crops alone in one year is in the neighborhood of seven hundred millions.

The following table shows the ratio of increase in the free-trade decade and decrease in the protective decade of the products of the farm mentioned:

Products.	Percentage of increase from 1850 to 1860.	Percentage of decrease from 1860 to 1870.
Corn	41	21
Cotton	118	44
Tobacco	117	39
Buckwheat	96	44
Rye	48	19
Pease and beans	64	61
Mules, &c.	105	2
Oxen	32	41
Hogs	10	25
Cattle	52	8

The following show an increase at both periods, but, with a solitary exception, at a rate in the protective period below the free-trade period:

Products.	Percentage of increase from 1850 to 1860.	Percentage of increase from 1860 to 1870.
Wheat	72	66
Oats	17	63
Barley	206	88
Potatoes	47	7
Butter	45	11
Horses	44	12
Cows	34	4
Orchard products	159	119
Garden products	206	18
Farming implements	62	22
Farms in value	103	25
Live stock	101	25
Value of animals slaughtered	91	67

I have shown great losses in all the departments of labor, and an unnatural and unhealthy increase of manufacturing capital from 1860 to 1870. The products of manufacture increased from 1850 to 1860 at the rate of 85 per cent. and agriculture at the rate of 100 per cent. Now, while agriculture was increasing at the rate of 100 per cent., thereby increasing the wealth of all those who were to purchase the products of manufacture, the increase of 85 per cent. in manufacturing was natural and healthy. But now we have manufactures increasing their product in 1870 at 124 per cent. and agriculture sinking below zero. That occupation that employs, feeds, and clothes one-half of our people, and creates three-fourths of all our annual wealth, and to whose prosperous and fruitful labor the whole forty millions look for their own prosperity is cursed with blight and barrenness. The logic of this position is inexorable. The manufacturers must cease, shut off their fires, and discharge their hands. They have prosecuted their victims to bankruptcy, and now, if they had an absolute despot to make their laws for protection just as they might wish and an army to enforce them, they could neither compel the desert to bloom nor the exhausted fountain to continue its stream of water. If they would prosper again they must unfetter the giant whom they have deceived with their caresses, and blinded and bound lest in the desperation of his wrath he shall bear away their gates and crush their temples over their heads.

I have said that protection transfers the surplus wealth of the consumers of the products of manufacture from their pockets to the pockets of the manufacturer. If this proposition is correct the census ought to show it. It showed in 1850 and 1860 all of our industries moving together, dependent on each other, intermingled with each other, and regulating each other by the unerring laws of demand and supply. Does the census of 1870 show the same facts? On the contrary, from some cause a tremendous revolution has taken place, and the immense wealth created by labor all over the country, and which ought to have remained where it was earned, has been attracted toward the East as unerringly as the magnetic needle is to the North. In 1870 there was $2,118,208,769 invested in manufactures in the United States, two-thirds of which was owned in the nine eastern States of Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Rhode Island, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey. These same States owned of the national wealth in 1850 $3,130,989,857, or 43 per cent.; but from that time to 1860 the center of wealth was following immigration toward the West. It was the creature of labor and followed its movements as inseparably as the shadow does the substance; and in 1860 they possessed of the national wealth $5,591,607,424, while their portion of the national wealth had relatively decreased from 43 per cent. to 34 per cent.; yet they had increased the sum of their wealth at the rate of 78 per cent. It was perfectly natural that their proportion of the national wealth should decrease and still they be in the enjoyment of the highest prosperity as they were, for their manufactures were paying them a higher profit then than they did in 1870. It was perfectly natural as the great army of population was continually moving to the West, and by their labor creating wealth, that their proportion should be greater than the proportion of the lesser population of the Eastern States, and that the wealth they created should appear upon the rolls of the Western States. But in 1870, after the existence of the law of enforced transfer of wealth, their wealth in the West parted hands with their labor, and while the laborer continued his way to the rich and inviting lands of the West his wealth, mysteriously enough, appears in the East in the columns of the manufacturer, standing guard for his protection!

In 1870, the wealth of the nine Eastern States that had two-thirds of all the manufacturing capital had increased from $5,591,607,424 to $15,290,032,689, or 50 per cent. of the national wealth. Not only did they stop decreasing their per cent. of the national wealth, but they bounded back over the point held by them in 1850, and mounted up to one-half of all our national wealth. Their increase in wealth in the first decade indicated high prosperity. But in the second decade their increase at 173 per cent., when the centers of population and labor were drifting farther away to the West, is not natural but marvelous. If no pernicious restrictions had been laid upon the labor of the people and every one had been permitted to enjoy without hinderance the rewards of his own toil, the census of 1870 would have shown that the nine Eastern States had parted with 9 per cent. more of the national wealth that had gone with the people to the fields of the West; and instead of 50 per cent. in 1870 they would have had 25 per cent., or seven and a half billions instead of fifteen. If they had maintained their proportion of the national wealth owned in 1850, which they were not doing for the first period, still they would have only had in 1870 ten billions instead of fifteen. So that by the powerful magnetic effects of these protected manufactures they have gained more than five billions in ten years to which they were not entitled, and which they would never have had but for the tariff; and this in addition to the five billions of national values destroyed by the tariff; and still the work of destruction and spoliation continues. The five billions transferred is lost to the laborer only, the five billions annihilated is lost both to the laborer and the nation.

The four States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania owned in 1870 more than half of all the capital invested in manufactures. They increased their wealth during the free-trade decade at 38 per cent. per head and during the protective decade at 132 per cent. per head. Is this large increase of wealth shared by the agriculturists of those States? If so, why does not the same prosperity exhibit itself in the agricultural States farther west? In the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, and Oregon, that owned but one-fifth of the capital invested in manufactures, the same prosperous condition is not seen, but the reverse of the picture. Their highest prosperity is seen in the free-trade decade and their lowest in the protective. They increased in wealth from 1850 to 1860 at 127 per cent. per head and from 1860 to 1870 at 64 per cent. per head. Here the tables are turned completely around, and strange to say the very same condition in which the manufacturing States swell and bloat with wealth is the condition in which the agricultural States go into "the sere and yellow leaf." These figures show that the States owning the manufacturing capital increased in wealth in the protective decade at a greatly increased ratio and the States comparatively without it at a greatly reduced ratio. The irresistible conclusion to my mind is that the increase goes to the manufacturer. While the non-manufacturing States were let alone by the Government and the laws of demand and supply were left to govern the markets, the movements of commerce, and the employment of labor, they kept their wealth. But as soon as the Government, in the excess of its maternal tenderness, began to protect its "infants" then their wealth took wings and flew away.

In 1870 the four manufacturing States named had $265 per head invested in agriculture, and the value of their farm products was $49 per head, while their manufacturing products was $225 per head. In the four manufacturing States there were 700,000 persons employed in manufacturing, and made wealth at the rate of $659 each, and there were 700,000 persons engaged in agriculture, and made wealth at the rate of $254 each. In the seven agricultural States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, Michigan, Wisconsin, and Oregon there were 160,000 persons engaged in manufactures, and made wealth at the rate of $1,210 each, and 1,600,000 persons engaged in agriculture, and made wealth at the rate of $98 each. The 160,000 persons engaged in manufactures made forty millions more money than 1,600,000 engaged in agriculture. One man employed in manufactures made more than ten in agriculture. The net profits of manufactures in the four Eastern States was 43 per cent., while in the Western States it was 47 per cent. From these figures it is evident that the manufacturer, whether in the East or West, is gathering a large harvest. And if the West had the same capital invested in that industry that the East has it would show the same growth in wealth, all of which, in both sections, would belong exclusively to the manufacturers. It is not all the people of the East that are growing so rapidly in wealth, nor are all the people of the East more prosperous than the people of the West. The feast is the manufacturer's. And wherever they are, East or West, just in proportion as their veins are swollen the veins of all others everywhere in the Union are depleted.

See the ratio of increase in the two decades of the four manufacturing States of Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New York, and Pennsylvania, and the four agricultural States of Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, and Wisconsin; the first owning 50 per cent. of the capital invested in manufactures, and the last 11 per cent.

States.	Percentage of increase from 1850 to 1860.	Percentage of increase from 1860 to 1870.
	Per capita.	Per capita.
Massachusetts	15	121
Rhode Island	42	76
New York	36	211
Pennsylvania	56	121
Illinois	180	64
Michigan	134	77
Wisconsin	157	58

Take again the State of Massachusetts with 11 per cent. of the capital invested in manufactures, and compare it with Illinois that has 4½ per cent. with nearly twice as many people. In 1850 Illinois had $156,265,006, and Massachusetts had $573,342,286. They began a race for the acquisition of wealth and ran through a course of two decades, one of free trade and the other of protection. Massachusetts began the race with the advantage of 100,000 more people and four hundred millions more wealth than Illinois. At the end of the first decade Illinois had $871,860,282 and Massachusetts had $815,237,433. Illinois gained at the rate of 457 per cent. and Massachusetts at 42. During the same time Illinois gained population at the rate of 101 per cent. and Massachusetts 23 per cent. They now enter upon their course in the protective decade with the advantage on the part of Illinois of $56,000,000 more wealth and a half million more people than Massachusetts. If Illinois continues to make the rapid gains in the protective decade she did in the free-trade decade Masssachusetts must be distanced. But what is the result at the end of the protective decade? Illinois has $2,121,680,570, and Massachusetts has $2,132,148,741. Illinois was loaded to death, and though she started $56,000,000 ahead and a half million the most people, she comes out of the race 1,000,000 of people ahead, but $10,000,000 behind. Illinois increased her wealth 143 per cent. instead of 457, and Massachusetts 161 per cent. instead of 42; and Illinois had increased her population 48 per cent. and Massachusetts 18 per cent. Massachusetts had increased her wealth at a ratio above her increase in the free-trade decade of 283 per cent., and Illinois had increased her wealth at a ratio below her increase in the free-trade decade 219 per cent. Or, to state it differently, 2,539,819 people in Illinois, with a capital of $871,860,282, made less money by ten millions than 1,457,351 people in Massachusetts with fifty-six millions less capital. The loss to Illinois is the loss of the entire labor of more than a million of her people. This million of people in Illinois labored hard to acquire wealth; what has become of the products of their labor? It has gone East. But have their burdens of taxation gone too? Let us see. A few years ago the Government imposed for a time a tax on incomes, upon the accumulated piles of realized wealth, and required a given per cent. as taxes from all those who made clear profits over and above a sum sufficient for family support. This wealth was taxed in conjunction with other subjects of taxation, and the internal-revenue receipts of the two States showed the taxes paid by each. The income-tax was gradually reduced until it was released in 1872, and the effect on the people of the two States in the imposition of taxes is shown by the following table. The sum of taxes paid to the internal revenue is in millions only.

Year.	Massachusetts.	Illinois.
1866	$34,000,000	$15,000,000
1867	28,000,000	12,000,000
1868	17,000,000	7,000,000
1869	9,000,000	13,000,000
1870	10,000,000	18,000,000
1871	6,000,000	15,000,000
1872	6,000,000	15,000,000
1873	3,000,000	16,000,000
1874	2,000,000	15,000,000
1875	2,000,000	17,000,000

Thus, while the wealth that had been transferred was a subject of taxation, Massachusetts paid a hundred per cent. more than Illinois, but when wealth was released Illinois paid 800 per cent. more than Massachusetts. The capitalist is growing richer and the laborer is growing poorer. His nose is to the grindstone, where it will remain as long as he continues to vote for his own spoliation and sustain as representatives those who lay the burdens of government upon the poor and give its benefits to the rich.

Let us follow up this wealth to the manufacturing States, and see if it is distributed among all the people, or only among the favored few. In 1866 there were 460,170 persons in the United States who had incomes or who were making something above a support. Their incomes aggregated $707,385,040. Of this number, 35,788 persons had $439,244,000, and 424,382 persons had $268,141,040. The 35,788 persons had incomes each of $12,273, and the 424,382 persons had incomes each of $631. The 38,000,000 people beside them had nothing above support! The nine Eastern States, owning two-thirds of all the manufacturing capital, had 21,066, (out of the 35,788 in the United States who had $12,273 each income,) and they had incomes of $309,323,620, or an average each of $14,683 over the exemption. If to this sum be added the incomes of those who had less than $5,000, they will have more than two-thirds of all the income in the United States, with only one-third of its population. What a startling exhibit! Thirty-five thousand seven hundred and eighty-eight persons in the United States have surplus wealth that averages annually $12,273 each, and 424,382 persons have surplus wealth that averages $631 each, and the 38,000,000 others have none; and this surplus wealth is found in the manufacturing States, who under a tariff for revenue were falling behind in the race for wealth. And, followed more closely, the great bulk of this surplus wealth is found in the possession of a few favored individuals, who have been protected by the Government against competition in business at the expense of all the others. The bulk of the wealth here traced to the nine Eastern States is found to be in the hands of 21,000 out of 12,000,000 of people. The annual exhibit shows that the States containing two-thirds of the people receive for their wages one-third of the annual values created, and the States containing one-third of the people receive two-thirds. And for this splendid condition of things we are indebted to "the great American system!"

The four States of Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, that had more than half of all the capital invested in manufactures in the United States, had more than half of all the incomes. They had $277,000,000 of the $439,000,000 from persons who paid on incomes over $5,000, while there were only $162,000,000 in all the other thirty-three States. And this income of persons in the four manufacturing States was in the hands of nineteen thousand persons out of a population of nine millions. The nine Eastern States had 70 per cent. of the incomes over $5,000, and 68 per cent. of all incomes in the United States. This extraordinary prosperity is not enjoyed by all the nine States mentioned, but only those engaged largely in manufactures. Rhode Island, that has less than one-fifth of the population of Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, but nearly as much capital in manufactures as all three of them combined, had three times as much income as all of them united.

In 1866, when surplus wealth was taxed, the nine Eastern States paid 62 per cent. of the aggregate internal-revenue tax; but in 1875, when the hand of the tax-gatherer was taken off of the strong boxes, because it was found to be odious, and laid at the doors of the poor, then their proportion of the internal taxes was only 26 per cent. In 1866 Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Kentucky, Virginia, and Missouri paid 21 per cent. of the internal revenue; but in 1875, when wealth was released and its proportion of the burdens laid upon the arms of the laborer, they paid 56 per cent. In 1866 the last-named States had 21 per cent. of the aggregate incomes and the nine Eastern States had 62 per cent.; yet in 1875 the Western States paid 56 per cent. of the internal-revenue tax and the Eastern States paid 26 per cent. During the existence of the income tax the State of New York in one year had more income than all the States in the Union combined west and south of the boundary of the nine Eastern States, and that was in the hands of a few thousand of her millions of people. Rhode Island had three times as much as Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont combined, and (in 1866) more than Virginia, West Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, and Tennessee, and that in the hands of less than one of every three hundred of her people. Less than a thousand persons in Rhode Island received more clear profits than nine millions of people in the South; and yet North Carolina, that had less than $150,000 income in 1866, pays to-day more internal-revenue tax than all the New England States, except Massachusetts, with their $26,000,000 of income. How forcibly does this fact remind us of that declaration in the preamble of the Constitution of the United States, that it was ordained to establish justice and promote the general welfare!

Virginia, upon whose bosom the fierce storm of battle poured its desolating hail, whose fields have so recently been swept with "a fire-shower of ruin," and whose winds still bear upon their wings the ashes of her desolation, even she pays more internal-revenue taxes than all New England combined, with their eighty millions of clear income. The wealthy complained that the income tax was odious; that it was inquisitorial; that it was an impertinent interference with their business for the tax-gatherer to ask them how much clear profit they made. It was offensive and distasteful to them to pay their proportion of the taxes to support the administration of the Government. They demanded its repeal, and it is gone. The tax that brought to the coffers of the Government annually forty-eight millions from the profits of capital is "gone glimmering through the shades of things that were." The forty-eight millions still come annually to the Government, but from a different source. It sends out its annual requisition for the forty-eight millions, but the messenger is commanded not to go to those who have wealth, but to those who have no income, and who make nothing above support. They have graciously released capitalists and corporations, with their annually growing surplus of millions, from the to them obnoxious tax, but they still retain with heroic devotion the tax on the medicine that finds its way to the hovels of the poor. The first great maxim of Adam Smith, which John Stuart Mill calls classic, says: "The subjects of every state ought to contribute to the support of the Government as nearly as possible in proportion to their respective abilities; that is, in proportion to the revenue they enjoy under the protection of the state;" but this maxim has been reversed by the financial policy of the administration, and the burdens of the citizens are lessened in proportion as they grow in wealth.

Now, sir, I have shown that under free trade all the States were prosperous, the agricultural more than the manufacturing, because of the constant flow of immigration to them; that under the influence of protection to manufactures the agricultural States are marching with a funeral step; that the manufacturing States, that had but one-third of the national wealth at the beginning of the protective period, now have more than one-half; that with one-third of the population they are receiving two-thirds of the annual surplus wealth, and that their profits are large and their products enormously increased. From these facts I can come to no other conclusion than that protection has effected the revolution, and that the constant annihilation of a large portion of the value of the products of labor, and the transfer of a large part of the wealth it creates to the protected class, is the real cause of hard times and business depression all over the land. It might be some mitigation of the great injustice done to other laborers if the employés of the manufacturers received the benefits of this profitable employment, as we are continually told they do. This pernicious doctrine bases most of its claims to success to the benefits it professes to confer upon the operatives of manufacturing industry.

We are constantly being told that the employer can and does give better wages when his industry is protected against competition; but the facts do not so show it. In 1860 the operatives received more of the necessaries and comforts of life in exchange for their wages than they do now. Then they received on an average $288 in gold per annum. In 1870 they received $377 in currency, equal to $344 gold; but then a dollar in gold would purchase nearly twice the quantity of articles necessary for the support of the laborer and his family that it will to-day. When all his wages have to be expended in purchasing protected articles whose prices have been enhanced 40 per cent., it is very plain that he is not protected. In fact, there never was since the foundation of the Government more destitution and distress and more cares and anxieties for life and support among manufacturing and mining laborers than to-day in the midst of protection. The boot-and-shoe business is one of the most prosperous of all our industries, and paid in 1870 a clear profit of 77 per cent., and that was certainly sufficient to enable the manufacturers to pay their workmen good wages. But in 1869 the employés of this branch of manufactures say: "Ten years ago the shoemakers of New England, as a class, were well fed, well clothed, well housed, and had their pockets well supplied with spending-money. Now they have less surplus money, are more poorly clothed, and are crowding themselves into smaller tenements; while many of them who formerly saw meat and butter daily upon their tables now see those articles there but seldom. During these ten years their food and family supplies have nearly doubled in prices while their wages have increased but half."

We have seen by the testimony of the factory operative that he is not benefited, but injured, by protection. How is it with the farm laborer? Does it increase the demand for his labor or the price of his wages? The demand for the labor of those who live by wages must necessarily increase with the increase of national wealth and cannot increase without it. If the 3,000,000 farmers are prosperous and increasing the stock of their wealth they have increased ability to employ and pay for labor on their farms. They will plant and cultivate more acres and raise more products for market and receive more wealth to employ labor and purchase the products of the labor of others. If a crop yield to the farmers a hundred millions more when exchanged at one period than another, that amount would seek the employment of labor in its various forms, and the demand for labor would raise the price of its wages. The farm laborer is even less fortunate than the laborer of the factory, for he saves nothing in either wages or expenditures. There are 2,000,000 of manufacturing and mining laborers, and with those dependent on them 5,000,000 people who are injured by protection. There are 3,000,000 agricultural laborers and those dependent on them, and 3,000,000 farmers and those dependent on them, together with over 20,000,000 people, all of whom are plundered by protection. The agricultural laborer only received $107 and his board in 1870. The demand for his labor was not such as to justify high wages when the farmer was only making 3½ per cent. on the capital invested. The farmers only made on an average $413 each, from which sum all expenses of the cultivation of the crop and family support have to come. Here are 8,000,000 laborers and with those dependent on them more than 25,000,000 who are not only not benefited but greatly injured. Who is benefited? Somebody must be. There must be some great interest subserved to draw around this capital at every session such pressure for protection to home industry, such tender solicitude for home markets. Who is it that is so alarmed "at foreign pauper labor?" Who is it whose voice is so potent with the administration as to cause it to smite with paralysis all the industries of the land for their benefit? Forty-two thousand manufacturers who have invested two thousand millions of capital, upon which they make over 40 per cent. clear profit, who made in 1870 an average of $22,583 each. These are the infants who are continually crying to the Government for maternal care and tenderness, and are as obstinate as Rachel of old in refusing to be comforted. These are the infants that are condemned by some mysterious law of nature to appear perpetually in swaddling-clothes, continually afflicted, and continually requiring the aid of soothing-syrup to lull them into a temporary repose. These are the infants whose boneless gums are always hanging upon the maternal nipples for sustenance and life and who are frightened into convulsions at the sight of "foreign pauper labor" when only 31,000 are foreigners themselves.

But the question will be asked, How are we to reduce the tariff and yet raise so large a sum as our yearly expenditures require? There is no difficulty in answering this question. We raised one hundred and fifty-seven millions during the last fiscal year with our imports largely cut down and with one-third of them bearing no duty. The average rate of duty on the dutiable goods was 40 per cent. Three hundred and eighty-six millions bore this duty and paid our revenue of one hundred and fifty-seven millions. One hundred and sixty-seven millions were free. Now let us abolish the free list and lay a uniform ad valorem tax of 25 per cent. on the whole of our imports and it will bring the same amount of duties. Six hundred millions of imports will give us one hundred and fifty millions of revenue. The present arrangement of the tariff was not designed to obtain revenue in the least oppressive way, but principally for protection. Lay an ad valorem tax of uniform rate and at the lowest per cent. possible to obtain the required revenue, and we will have but little of the evils of protection. It would greatly stimulate our foreign commerce and increase our imports till our revenues from customs at 25 per cent. would in a few years reach two hundred millions, when the rate should again be lowered and never permitted to exceed one hundred and fifty millions. Repeal all taxes on medicines, matches, bank-checks, and all taxes derived from the sale of adhesive stamps, that bring six millions and a half of revenue. Repeal all taxes on tobacco except manufactured tobacco and cigars, so arranging it that it will bring twenty millions instead of thirty-seven, as now. Retain the tax on spirits and fermented liquors that now bring sixty-two millions. Re-impose the tax on all incomes over $5,000 exclusive of the exemption of $1,000. It brought to the Government twenty-six millions ten years ago and will bring thirty millions now. Repeal the law that exempts any of the deposits in savings-banks and tax them as all other deposits in bank are taxed, and it will bring three and a half millions more than it does now. Re-impose the tax on the gross receipts from passengers and freights and on the dividends and interest of bonds of railroad companies. It brought eleven millions of revenue ten years ago. Let that tax be half what it was before. Their clear profits were one hundred and eighty-nine millions in 1874, and they can well afford to pay a tax of five millions. Re-impose the tax on the gross receipts from premiums, dividends, and additions to surplus funds of insurance companies. It brought two millions in 1866. Re-impose the tax on sales of stocks, bonds, foreign exchange, gold and silver. It brought two and a half millions in 1864. It will bring ten millions now. These sources of revenue will bring to the Government over three hundred millions annually.

If we would reduce taxation on the people and stop the spoliation and destruction of their property; if we would bring back the golden days of other years, when labor was prosperous and the people happy; if we would dispel the gloom that has been hanging over the land and revive all our prostrated industries, we must equalize taxation. We must take some of the heavy burdens off the backs of the laboring masses and lay them where they belong—upon the shoulders of the wealthy. We must cut down the tariff till it shall bring revenue to the Government and not protection to the capitalist and bankruptcy to the masses. We must cut away with unsparing hand the abuses that have grown up in the Administration, requiring the annual expenditure of millions without any benefit to the Government. Then will confidence be restored, labor be employed and rewarded, business resume its natural conditions, capital flow in channels of legitimate investment instead of wild and visionary speculations, and the country will resume its march in prosperity and peace.

And then, on motion of Mr. WARREN, (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLAND: Petitions for post-routes from Lebanon to Gainsville, Missouri, and from Ava to Nesi Plains, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DE BOLT: The petitions of Milton Myers and others, for a post-route from Trenton, Missouri, to Myersville; and of Putnam Fulkerson and others, for a post-route from Trenton to Modena, Missouri, to the same committee.

By Mr. FULLER: The petition of Crawford Ryan, for pay for property lost at New Orleans in 1865, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. KNOTT: Papers relating to the petition of Catharine [illegible]ly, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. JOHN REILLY: The petition of 39 citizens of Eastern Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 74 citizens of Hollidaysburgh, Pennsylvania, for aid to be extended the Southern Pacific Railroad, to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

By Mr. STENGER: Papers relating to the claim of Solomon Booke for services as mail-route agent, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: Papers relative to the purchase of additional grounds for public buildings at Knoxville, Tennessee, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Eliza McConnell, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ——: The petition of citizens of the United States, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 31, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1589) to amend section 190 of the Revised Statutes was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 1590) to remedy an error in enrollment was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

CORRECTION.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to make a correction of some statistics which I furnished with reference to the Red River trade a few days ago. By mistake the tonnage was stated in tons instead of pounds. It makes altogether too large a tonnage for so small a river, although the trade has been immense within the last year, the total tonnage being 24,429 tons; but it was stated in pounds as presented the other day. I desire to make this correction in order that the facts may appear to the committee in their true light in the consideration of the subject.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Good Templars of Montana Territory, signed by the officers, representing 700 members, praying for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented the petition of Admiral Charles Wilkes, praying that under the act of Congress approved May 22, 1872, making appropriations for the completion of certain books describing the results of Wilkes' exploring expedition, an investigation be made into the reasons for the stoppage of the work and the suspension of payments therefor; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. SHERMAN presented the petition of C. A. Folsom and others, citizens of the State of Wisconsin, praying for the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the memorial of W. J. Morgan & Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM presented the memorial of 175 citizens of Brown County, Wisconsin, asking an appropriation for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement, and also for the construction of a canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City to the Mississippi River in accordance with the third plan recommended to the Government by General Warren; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Minnesota, requesting the Senators and Representatives representing Minnesota in Congress to use their efforts in favor of a bounty for the destruction of grasshoppers; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an extension of time for the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the petition of James Roberts and others, together with certain affidavits in support of their claim which is embodied in a bill now before the Committee on Revolutionary Claims. I move that the petition be referred to that committee in order to accompany the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, requesting Congress to take such action as may be necessary to relieve certain settlers on the line of the Northern Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of an appropriation for improving the navigation of the Red River of the North; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WEST presented a petition of citizens of Louisiana, praying Congress to give favorable consideration to the project for building the Texas and Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. CONOVER presented the petition of Peter La Rose, praying for compensation for carrying the United States mail on route No. 6140, in Georgia, from July 1 to October 31, 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of William C. West, a commander on the retired list of the Navy, praying that he be paid the 75 per cent. of "sea pay" of a lieutenant commander on the active list, as provided by law; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. ALCORN presented additional papers in relation to the claim of James J. Ritch, of Scott County, Mississippi, for compensation for supplies, &c., furnished United States troops; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ALCORN. I present the memorial of John Russell, of Warren County, Mississippi, who had a claim before the commission of claims, and they found in their adjudication that he had been engaged in selling cotton, confounding him with another person. He submits now a memorial to Congress, asking that his case may be re-referred to the claims commission, or that Congress will give him such relief as he is entitled to, showing very clearly, by the proof that he adduces, that he has been confounded with another person, and that he has not sold cotton, but has ever been and is loyal to the Government. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of Henry M. Nagle, of San José, Santa Clara County, California, stating that he is and has been largely engaged in the business of the manufacture or distillation of brandy; that his premises were destroyed February 26, 1869; and that he lost thereby stamps to the value of $60,000 which had never been used. As these were unused tax stamps, such as he was required by law to affix to casks, he asks that he may be remunerated therefor. As this claim is for refunding a tax, perhaps the proper reference would be to the Committee on Finance; and if there is no objection, I ask its reference to that committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. BOOTH presented the petition of J. A. Kelting, administrator of the estate of Elizabeth Hunt, deceased, praying that a pension be allowed to her children by Simon Johnson, a former husband, who was a seaman in the United States Navy; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of the Springfield Toy Manufacturing Company, and F. W. Porter and 60 other citizens of Springfield, Vermont, praying for a repeal of the two-cent United States stamp-tax; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a remonstrance of vessel-owners of Pennsylvania, against the registry of foreign-built vessels as American vessels when owned by citizens of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the senate of Pennsylvania, requesting the Senators and Members of the House of Representatives from that State to favor the guarantee asked by the Texas Pacific Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Williamsport, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to guarantee interest on bonds of the Texas Pacific Railroad; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented resolutions of a workingmen's meeting held in Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, protesting against a subsidy to the Texas Pacific Railroad and urging certain financial changes; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New Castle, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to repeal the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Middletown Centre grange, favoring the reduction of postage on third-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN presented the petition of William H. Stephens, postmaster at Belleville, Essex County, New Jersey, praying to be relieved from payment for stamps to the value of $88.69, stolen from his post-office on the night of October 14, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WALLACE presented the memorial of a meeting of workingmen held at Harrisburgh, Pennsylvania, protesting against the resumption of specie payments and against aid to the Texas Pacific Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, praying for aid to the Texas Pacific Railway Company; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of R. B. Forbes, of Boston, Massachusetts, asking payment for supplies furnished to the United States steamer Niphon, in 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 130) for the relinquishment of the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, California, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. There was referred to the Committee on Claims the memorial of Alfred Spink and Daniel Wolf, praying to be re-imbursed for cotton seized and sold by the Government of the United States in 1861, 1862, or 1863. The committee find that in 1865 this same claim was before the Senate and reported upon by the then chairman of the committee, Mr. Clarke, adversely. There has been no additional testimony so far as we can find from the record, and we therefore report the memorial back and recommend that the claim be rejected. In this recommendation we ask the concurrence of the Senate.

The adverse report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas, praying Congress to pass an act refunding the cotton-tax collected in that State for certain years, have had the same under consideration, and think that it properly belongs to the Committee on Finance. They therefore ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition and papers of Nolan S. Williams, executor of Alfred A. Williams, deceased, late a citizen of Louisiana, praying compensation for property belonging to the estate of the decedent taken and appropriated to the use of the United States Army during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 320) to reduce the number and increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps, reported it with an amendment.

PUBLIC SQUARE IN DUBUQUE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes, have had the same under consideration, and directed me to report it back without amendment, accompanied by a report on the subject from the Secretary of the Interior. This bill is very short, and I think there will be no objection to present action upon it.

Mr. SARGENT. If it will not lead to debate, I shall not object. I think the unfinished business, the District bill, ought to have precedence.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I think it will not lead to debate.

Mr. SARGENT. I will only remark that the bonds will go to protest to-morrow unless we act promptly.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 169) giving the consent of the United States to the county of Dubuque, in the State of Iowa, to construct county buildings in Washington Square, in the city of Dubuque, and for other purposes.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think it due to the nature of the case that the chairman should state the facts.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will state them in one minute. Originally the city of Dubuque was laid out under a plat by the United States, and this square was reserved for public uses. It is on the extreme verge of the city. Now the county of Dubuque desires to erect a court-house in the center of it. Our committee have taken the precaution to inquire of the Secretary of the Interior and have a full report upon it, and there is no objection. There is some question whether the United States has any title in the land whatever; but so far as it has it the bill merely relinquishes it for the purpose indicated, and for no other.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does it not relinquish it for all purposes?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. No, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I should like to have the last clause of the bill, the release, read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And whatever title the United States now has to said premises is hereby relinquished to the county of Dubuque for the purposes herein indicated, and for no other.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me upon the reading of that clause that it is an absolute relinquishment of the title, but carries with it a condition that the property is to be used for certain purposes, and not for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I can explain in a moment the real purpose of this bill. When the city of Dubuque was laid out originally by the General Government, two squares were reserved for public purposes, or rather for park purposes. Of course, the United States has no interest in these parks except for the purposes indicated in the original grant to the city. Now the county of Dubuque desires to erect a new court-house, and one of these parks is considered an eligible site for the court-house, and a good many people think it should be built there; but the county does not wish to enter upon the expense of the court-house upon this spot without the consent of the United States being given. That is what this bill proposes to do. It also proposes that this consent shall be given subject to the proper authorities in the city of Dubuque, to wit: the city councils, the mayor, aldermen, &c. The United States has no title to the land that I know of, except that it was set apart by the United States for the purposes of a public park. Now the United States gives its consent to the erection of a court-house in this park, should the authorities of the city of Dubuque also consent or give the proper authority? That is all there is in it.

Mr. BOUTWELL. As I understand it, this square was set aside by the Government of the United States for a public park?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It being the land of the United States?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Cannot the United States repeal that act? Is not the title perfect in the United States to-day?

Mr. ALLISON. That is a very grave question, which I do not wish to decide at this particular moment. I should want to refer that to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It seems to me it is merely giving to the city or to the county of Dubuque this tract of land whatever it is; and as in Dubuque I know not a long time will have passed before they will ask for public buildings to be erected by the National Government, I think it might be well to keep this park for our own uses.

Mr. ALLISON. As a matter of history, I can inform the Senator that Dubuque has now a public building which cost the United S ates $200,000, and it is not built on this ground.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I am speaking now as a prophet, not as a historian.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know of any particular objection to this bill, although there is remonstrance I believe with the committee, signed by several citizens of Dubuque, protesting against this action; but inasmuch as the city authorities have control over it, I see no objection to the passage of this bill, and therefore I shall vote for it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What is the land worth?

Mr. ALLISON. It is worth considerable; a dollar a foot, I suppose.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Let the bill go over to allow any person who has any desire to examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 368) to authorize the President of the United States to promote First Lieutenant David I. Ezekill, of the Fourth Regiment of Infantry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 369) to exempt all vessels engaged in the navigation of the Mississippi River and its tributaries above the port of New Orleans from entries and clearances; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McDONALD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 370) to amend an act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act granting a pension to Captain Henry M. Scott,' approved April 9, 1872;" which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONOVER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 371) granting right of way through the public lands to the Saint John's Railway Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 372) for the relief of J. L. Requa, S. B. Hubbard, and others; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 373) to promote the efficiency of the Light-House Service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 374) for the adjudication of title to lands claimed by José Apis and Pablo Apis in the State of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ALLISON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MITCHELL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 376) granting a pension to Aaron B. Hughes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 377) for the relief of the widow of Harry Hensley, late of Company E, Third North Carolina Mounted Infantry; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of Sidney S. McLane; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 379) to enable Charles H. Fondé to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for improvement in dredging-machines; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 380) to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of settlers on railroad lands," approved June 22, 1874; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 381) to extend the jurisdiction of the district and circuit courts of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Louisville, Kentucky; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Ingalls B. Andrews; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 384) for the relief of Mrs. Eliza T. Potter, widow of Lorenzo T. Potter, late of Charleston, South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 385) for the relief of Théophile Brugnier and John Goewey; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 6) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States so as to elect the President and Vice-President thereof by a direct vote of the people thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 7) to amend the Constitution of the United States so as to elect United States Senators by a direct vote of the people of the several States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Clarissa Bishop, of Louisiana, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. STEVENSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Catherine E. Small be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I notice that the other day a House joint resolution, No. 50, or some such number, was passed. It occurs to me that about three years ago when a bill was under discussion to prescribe the enacting clause of bills and also to define the construction of statutes a proposition was made to abolish the practice of legislating by joint resolutions. A joint resolution requiring the signature of the President is in all respects the same thing as a bill; but it makes two forms for the same substance. It is not only an inconsistency, but it makes an inconvenience in searching the statutes. Whoever wishes to find what is the law must look through the acts and then through the joint resolutions. A proposition was made, I think by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] who filled the chair four years with such distinguished ability, that all joint resolutions should be journalized the same as bills; but it was afterward, in the course of discussion, thought unnecessary, and perhaps ineffective, to pass any act on that subject, inasmuch as it would not bind a future Congress. The Constitution speaks of resolutions which may receive the assent of the President, and of course they must be joint resolutions; but a general understanding was entered into by the Senate that all joint resolutions should be journalized as bills, and the Presiding Officer stated that he would direct the Secretary so to journalize them and to have them so engrossed and so enrolled. For some time afterward that was done. Whenever a joint resolution was offered the Presiding Officer would say, "This will be put in the form of a bill." I see now we have gone back to the old custom; and the custom is not very old either. It does not go back to the early Congresses, where I think joint resolutions were scarcely known, if at all.

I thought I would call attention to this matter and perhaps some of the Senators who have interest in the order of proceedings may take it into consideration.

Mr. HAMLIN. While there is no question before the Senate, I wish to say a word upon the very subject to which the Senator from Rhode Island has, I think very properly, called the attention of the Senate. I confess I was surprised myself to learn that there had crept into the Revised Statutes a recognition in terms of what we call joint resolutions. They are legislative anomalies; they have no business here. They have gotten here, however. There was an attempt made to keep them out, as the Senator has suggested. The practical trouble which was found to exist in the attempt was this: Joint resolutions came to us from the other House. If we changed their titles to bills, and they went back to the House, it involved the necessity in the House of retracing all the steps they had taken, to reconsider the bill on its passage, and to reconsider the bill on its engrossment, before they could get to a point where they could amend the title. All those votes were necessary there; and it became somewhat difficult to accomplish it. Perhaps in some cases it was done; in some it was not done; and I rather think, on the whole, it was pretty much abandoned. In looking at the Revised Statutes, I find in chapter 2, title 1, section 8—

The resolving clause of all joint resolutions—

"The resolving clause," recognizing them as statutes—shall be in the following form:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, &c.

Then "All bills shall be in the following form," thereby placing a joint resolution in the precise category with a bill. I myself, a few days since, introduced a resolution, and it has gone to the Committee on the Judiciary, directing them to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the Revised Statutes and striking out what I think should never have been there. This thing, I think, had its origin in the Senate in this way: A joint resolution was introduced to correct an error in the engrossment of a bill which had passed both Houses or to amend it by striking out some clause which it was not the intention of either branch to incorporate. Early in the practice of Congress joint resolutions were limited to that specific thing, and after having accomplished it they became a dead letter; but it is of recent date that joint resolutions have been introduced both here and in the House in the character of laws. I think the sooner we get rid of them the better. I hope the Judiciary Committee will report to abolish the practice, and that then we shall go back and insist that all laws which are to be statutes shall be in the form of bills and not joint resolutions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Senator takes his seat the Chair would like to call his attention to the last subdivision of section 7, article 1, of the Constitution, which declares that concurrent resolutions, except on adjournments, require the approval of the President.

Mr. HAMLIN. I was going to refer to that. I have examined the matter and have looked at the clause in the Constitution, and I have no hesitation in saying that there is no language in the Constitution which recognizes a joint resolution as a law. I know reference is made to all acts and resolutions of either body, but that language which is used in the Constitution—and I meant to have referred to it—never contemplated such a thing as a joint resolution which was to stand as a statute of the land.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator misapprehends the precise point that the Chair invites his attention to. If this matter is to be submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary or their attention called to it, that reference should be made to the clause of the Constitution referred to, which reads as follows:

Every order, resolution, or vote to which the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives may be necessary (except on a question of adjournment) shall be presented to the President of the United States; and before the same shall take effect, shall be approved by him, or being disapproved by him, shall be repassed by two-thirds of the Senate and House of Representatives, according to the rules and limitations prescribed in the case of a bill.

It will be observed that the Constitution declares that every concurrent resolution wherein the concurrence of the two Houses is necessary shall be presented to the President for his approval, and to that characteristic of a bill enjoined by the organic act the Chair calls attention The practice of the Senate has been on concurrent resolutions to pass them without the approval of the President. This would seem to be at variance with the Constitution; for that instrument treats concurrent resolutions, except for adjournments, in the same light that it does bills, both requiring the approval of the President before they shall take effect. Can concurrent resolutions be of any force without such approval? is the question the Chair sought to bring to the attention of the Senate.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. LEVI P. LUCKEY, his Private Secretary, announced that the President had, on the 25th instant, approved and signed the act (S. No. 236) to amend section 3767 of the Revised Statutes in relation to the purchase of paper for the public printing.

TAXATION OF LANDS.

Mr. BOOTH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to the Senate copy of correspondence on file in the Department with the committees of the Forty-third Congress respecting taxation of lands granted to States and corporations.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further resolutions the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SARGENT to the amendment of Mr. ALLISON.

The amendment of Mr. ALLISON was to insert as a proviso:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

The amendment of Mr. SARGENT was to add thereto the following:

Provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000, and when the limit herein provided for shall be reached, the board of audit shall be and is abolished, and all the powers conferred upon that board shall cease and determine, and all the papers and public property in their possession shall be delivered to the commissioners of the District or their successors.

Mr. SARGENT. If the Senator from Massachusetts, who is entitled to the floor, [Mr. DAWES,] will allow me a moment, I will remark that the latter part of the amendment does not reach the point which I designed. It does not abolish the board of audit, and probably would not do so under a year. It ought to be more carefully prepared. I understand such a proposition is pending in another form before the Committee on the District of Columbia, and will probably be reported favorably. I will modify my amendment, consequently, by withdrawing that portion of it commencing with the words "and when the limit."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. President, in view of the necessity of immediate action upon this bill, I have hesitated whether it were my duty to interpose any delay in asking the Senate to listen to anything I might say upon the subject; but the committee who had this matter in charge on Friday permitted the Senate to adjourn over until Monday without objection. The matter is one of very great importance. The debate itself has turned almost exclusively upon what has been done; and yet the matter before the Senate makes no reference to any mischief of the past, or any proposed change of the policy out of which this question has arisen.

All of us agree that these bonds are substantially, to all intents and purposes, a Government bond. All of us agree that the United States will fail in keeping its faith if it fails to make appropriation for the interest that is due upon them. They have become a part of the public debt of the nation. The monthly statement will hereafter, if it correctly states the condition of the Government liabilities, represent that there is added to the debt of the nation $15,000,000. That statement will continue from year to year, until all of our great war debt will, by its terms, and I trust in fact, disappear. That statement will continue long after those who participated in placing it upon the statement of the Government liabilities shall have passed away, and, I fear, be forgotten. And yet with this unanimity as to the character of this debt and as to the obligation of the Government to provide for the interest according to its terms, it goes into the statement of the public debt depreciated, and as the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] says, with a black eye at the outset, 10 or 12 per cent. below its actual value in the market.

It is worth while then, it seems to me, however pressing the necessity for immediate action upon this bill, to delay a little, if thereby we may be able to find out what it is that so depreciates the public credit as far as these bonds of the United States are concerned; and therefore I venture, little as I feel myself able to do it, to ask the attention of the Senate to the history of this new indebtedness of the nation. Substantially heretofore that indebtedness has been the war debt of the nation. No one has had the hardihood, since the war passed till now, for any purposes of civil life, to propose an addition of a single million of dollars to that debt. Those of us, of whom I was one, who were instrumental in placing an additional obligation that shall abide for fifty years to come, in the monthly and annual statements and reports of the Treasury of the United States, for any object, however desirable and gratifying to us personally it may be, should take heed, I apprehend, that we have an answer to make to others who may, perhaps, not quite, like ourselves, delight in the beauty and glory of this capital merely. There are those in the nation (and they are not those who frequent this capital, who delight, as we do, in these grand and beautiful changes that have come over it,) who do not, as we do, see that it has indirectly a beneficial effect upon all the influences that obtain and prevail here. They are more in number; they bear the burdens of the nation; and to them I desire that we may be able to answer why it is that, in time of peace, when we are recommended to increase taxation that we may supply the demands of a sinking fund to which the faith of the nation has been pledged in time of war, we have added $15,000,000 to the public debt. They will look in vain among the records of the proceedings of either House of Congress for an explanation. They will find that the law which imposed this new burden upon the people passed both branches of the Congress of the Union without the attention of those who supported it being called to the fact that it created this new debt. They will find that in one branch not only was the attention of the body itself not called to that question, but the solemn declaration of the chairman of the committee who reported the bill was that no such obligation existed.

They turn to the statute itself, and they find that though the statute, in the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] was drawn by very able lawyers, and clearly and distinctly stated what was intended by those who proposed it, this obligation of the Government of the United States arises out of a circumlocution so involved, so uncertain, that it deceived the chairman of the committee in one branch as to its true meaning; but it took—I have before me a pamphlet of briefs and arguments—it took eight lawyers and two Attorneys-General to decide the question, and the Attorneys-General surrendered to a cannonade of briefs and arguments of a whole platoon of the legal profession before they could determine whether this was a bond of the United States or not.

How came it? If there is any spot in the United States that has suffered more than any other from vicious and unwise legislation, it is what is left of that territory of ten miles square which the Constitution of the United States placed in express terms under the exclusive jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States. Various have been the devices by which that Congress has striven to relieve itself of the plain and express injunction of the Constitution itself. I am told that in the early history they turned it over bodily to a commission, but within our recollection here Congress created bodies politic—mayors, aldermen, and city corporations to do that which the Constitution says belongs to Congress in a clause giving Congress power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever. We all know how sadly the District fared under those corporations; how nothing grew and prospered but public debt; how until those could be continued no longer Congress, instead of resuming and peforming its duty itself, extinguished those corporations only to create another, more remarkable and more magnificent and broad than any that had gone before it. They created a governor of this District. He had a staff. Mr. President, do you know what a governor's staff is? Some of our friends the Senators about me know what a governor's staff is. It is a body of armed men who go on either side of his excellency sword in hand to protect him against the populace as he goes in and out. They are elegant gentlemen. In the history of governments they have performed many a gallant part, and I am not going to disparage their merits on any field. He had a message, too. He had a veto power; a pocket veto, too, like Andrew Jackson. He could pardon the criminals as fast as the District courts could convict them. He had a legislature also, and the words of the statute are that the legislative power of the District of Columbia shall vest in that legislative body whose parliament-house was somewhere on Judiciary Square. They had a lower house with a speaker and the usher of the black rod, and an upper house with a presiding officer; and they legislated; they legislated night and day, and when they could be tolerated no longer history tells us that running a race with legislation in these Halls, they gave up only with their life, and the last night of their life witnessed scenes of legislation in that great hall that would become anything but the few rights that were left to this District of Columbia. They had a prerogative without which there can be no great government on the face of the earth, and that was to involve themselves in debt; and they asserted that prerogative in a manner past all precedent in all history. They had a board of public works which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] tells us was subordinate to that Legislature, and perhaps upon a reading of the statute we should so infer, and yet in point of fact as little subordinate to the Legislature as if they were an imperium in imperio. I now read from the statute:

There shall be in the District a board of public works.

* * * * * * *

The board of public works shall have entire control—

I call the attention of the Senator from Indiana—entire control of and make all regulations which they shall deem necessary for keeping in repair the streets, avenues, alleys, and sewers of the city—and all other works which may be intrusted to their charge by the Legislative Assembly or Congress.

The streets and alleys and sewers the statute gave them entire and absolute control of, and such other public works as the Legislative Assembly or Congress might give to them. One would, of course, infer that this control of the streets and alleys was merely to superintend them; that ordinary control which belongs to the general administration of city affairs, of seeing to their being kept clean and protected, and the like; and such, I doubt not, was the idea of those who drew this statute. But under that provision of exclusive control, and by virtue of that, sprang, independent of the Legislature of the District of Columbia, that grand system of internal improvements in this city which has involved first the city of Washington, then the District of Columbia, then the board of public works itself, in a debt so heavy that all sank together under its weight, and appealed to Congress for salvation. It is true that further on in the section which creates this board is this provision:

All contracts made by the said board of public works shall be in writing, and shall be signed by the parties making the same, and a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the District; and said board of public works shall have no power to make contracts to bind said District to the payment of any sums of money except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriations shall have been made.

There was a provision of law which, if adhered to by these men, made it utterly impossible for them to have incurred $1 of debt that we should have been called on to meet. They were prohibited from making any contract of any kind unless it be in writing, unless it be in pursuance of an appropriation by the District Legislature, and until after the appropriation was made; and any contract made in advance of that legislation was void, and not worth the paper it was written upon. With the provision of law in pursuance of which the contract was to be made, with the appropriation upon which compensation for it was to rely already made, there was no room for a public debt; and the debt itself exists to-day only by a departure from the plainest express provision of law in the outset. They covered this District all over as with shingles with contracts that had none of the authority or sanction required for their validity by law. They carried on these grand schemes in that way.

Well, Mr. President, we saw this going on; we saw the city that we knew under the mayors and aldermen that had gone before this grand government as dirty and filthy, with pigs and cattle roaming unmolested all over it, suddenly changing into the most beautiful city on the face of the earth, and we were glad with the people of this city in the change that was going on, and yet we felt that there was a day of reckoning coming. By and by the tax-payers of this District began to groan. Soon came charges of scandal and corruption. I am not here myself to cast any personal reflections upon any gentleman connected with that government or with that which succeeded it. So far as I know, I have no occasion to do so. But I am speaking of the history of this debt. So frequent and so loud were these complaints and so dark were these suspicions that were being cast upon the character and administration of public affairs, that an appeal was made to Congress, and there came up to this body from the House of Representatives a resolution asking the Senate to join the House in a committee of investigation to inquire into two things: first, the truth of these charges that reflected upon the integrity and purity of the administration of affairs in this District; and, second, into the possibility of so amending this grand scheme of government as to protect them in the future; and out of that investigation came the law now upon the statute-book.

What was the purpose of that law? It in the forefront extinguished this great government that had lasted three years, and has succeeded in that brief space in involving itself, and as I have already shown the Government of the United States, in a debt greater than all the current expenses of the Government of the United States in any one year of twenty after its foundation. The first thing in this bill was to extinguish that government. If those who enacted that bill supposed anything was accomplished by it, it was first that that government should forever pass away; second, that as soon as was possible, and by the aid of a joint committee of able men, a new one should be put in its place; and, thirdly, that in the brief intervening space, having required this committee to report their frame of government on the very first day of the next session, whatever government was needed in this District to keep it along should be confided to three commissioners, to be appointed by the President with the advice and consent of this body.

Now it becomes necessary to inquire whether these three needs were accomplished by that bill thus enacted into a law. Take the purpose for which it was enacted, the mischief out of which it grew, the plain intent which runs through it all. The extinction of that government was to be the extinction of its policies. It was not merely to put out of office the men who under that government had inaugurated all that was complained of and put in their place three other gentlemen to carry out their system. The committee made no report; there was in debate no word uttered to indicate that the committee thought that those men in office were not just as worthy to continue, if the system was to continue, as any other men. For the purpose of relieving the District of the system, this committee found no other possible way but to relieve it of the government itself, and to expressly (as I shall, I think, show before I get through) terminate the system itself. Apparently, very properly and necessarily, somebody must take care of the District in the meantime till this joint committee should produce for consideration here another plan of government. In passing let me say that in due time and in obedience to the authority of this law, as able a committee as it was possible to select discharged their duty, and brought in on the first day of the next session a bill for a government grander, I think, in all its proportions than that which it was intended to displace. I do not profess to understand the bill of that committee. I never saw anything exactly like it. I can liken it to nothing else but a prize essay upon the philosophy of government with an enacting clause. But suffice it to say, and that is all I care about in this argument, that it was in pursuance of the manifest intent of this law that so far as was possible the old government and all that pertained to it, consistently with the rights of the creditors of that government, should pass away. This provisional government, that was by the terms of the act to last until the 1st day of December following, was clothed with the most limited powers. The act started off with giving them the powers of the board of public works except so far as it should limit them. One of these powers was to have the general superintendence of the streets; another, of the public institutions; but, that they might not undertake to carry out the policy of those who had been legislated out of office and whose authority had been taken from them, just see what it was determined that they should not do.

But said commission in the exercise of such power or authority—

That is, the authority of the board of public works—

shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act.

Whatever it was necessary for them to do as administrative officers in keeping the peace in this District for nine months they were authorized to make a contract for; whatever was necessary to preserve and protect from damage any of these grand improvements already completed or commenced and not completed they were authorized to do; and there their authority ended. Is it possible that anybody can doubt what is the meaning of that? Is it possible that anybody can doubt that they are simply administrators de bonis non to this great estate, and merely to collect its débris and gather in its fragments and take care that nothing be lost, either of those public works that had been completed or of those that had been begun and were not completed. Let me read it again, Mr. President:

Shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted by the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements.

"Protection or preservation" are the operative words, "of improvements existing or commenced and not completed." In the spirit of what I say was the manifest object and purpose of this law three men were appointed; I am happy to say in passing, three men of character and influence at their homes, and here, in whom the people of the District from their character would have reason to place implicit confidence, and in whose integrity and honesty of purpose I have still that same implicit confidence; and I count it a matter of congratulation that, if the construction they have in my opinion erroneously put upon their duties here is to prevail, this provisional government fell into the hands it did; otherwise, with a power according to their construction unlimited to issue bonds of the United States, had it not been for the character of these commissioners the limit would only have been the market. I have shown what were their duties; but there was another board created, having no reference to these duties, independent of them, and in as express terms as law could make it, having no reference to the duties of this board of commissioners, and that was the board of audit:

It shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement—

What? What these commissioners were authorized to do? What these commissioners might undertake to do? Not at all.

A board of audit to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works, hereinafter specified.

There is the beginning and the end of their authority. "All the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and the board of public works hereinafter specified." The board of public works was to cease to exist the moment this law passed. They could incur no obligation whatever the moment this law passed, for they were functus officio. It was the unfunded and floating debt that they were to leave behind as a legacy to those who came after them that was to be audited by this board of audit. Not an act of this board of commissioners, not a contract that this board of commissioners should enter into for anything within the province of their duty as such board, was to come under this audit. This shows what was the purpose of this act. It was to make a dividing line between the past and the future. What had been done the committee in this bill wisely proposed not to make subject of legislation, but provide for and take care of, and to take as good care that it should not be repeated. Can there be anything more explicit than this? "Hereinafter specified." Now let us see what is "hereinafter specified."

Namely: first, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates;—

That is an old debt—

secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works;—

That is a thing of the past—

thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia;—

Equally a matter of the past—

fourthly—

Which is the only matter of discussion here—

fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising—

Now, let us see—arising—

They must be that kind of claims and no other—arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works.

As the board of public works was to cease the moment this law passed, this meant contracts in existence when the law passed; claims that might exist before the law passed or that might arise after the law under the same contracts, but they were the contracts of the board of public works, not contracts hereafter made, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] seemed to argue, for the board of public works was not in being "hereafter" to create a contract, but claims growing out of contracts already made, which claims might arise from something which should occur in reference to those contracts either before or after the passage of the act.

The Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] in the debate on Friday said that he was surprised when he came to read this passage to see how broad it was; and he said he would venture to say that the Senator from Massachusetts had met with the same surprise when he read the law; he had no idea that it was so broad. I say in all candor that when I came to read this law I was surprised that it was so narrow. I do not know how language can make it more plain than it has reference only and solely to the liquidation of contracts of the board of public works, which, ex necessitate rei, must have existed before the board of public works themselves ceased to exist.

Then it is "claims arising" under a contract. These must be claims of the government upon the contractor, or claims of the contractor and his privies upon the government. They cannot be claims of a third person, a stranger to this contract, for no third person or stranger to the contract can base a claim of any kind upon the contract itself. The government may have its claim upon the contractor, as was said here the other day it had upon those who had the contract to lay wooden pavement; but these commissioners cannot liquidate that claim by giving a 3.65 bond. That is a claim of the government upon the contractor. The contractor entered into a contract to lay and maintain for three years a wooden pavement in a given street, and he has failed to keep his contract. The government has a claim upon him under that contract; but they cannot liquidate that claim by giving anybody a 3.65 bond of their own for it. On the other hand, the contractor or his privy may have a claim under that contract upon the government. That claim may arise from something that occurred before the passage of the act, or, as was properly provided here, "hereafter;" but still, under the contract, that is a claim of the contractor on the government, and that is the claim that this board of audit was authorized and required to audit. Now, what is more narrow, if I may use the word, limited, circumscribed, than this stipulation that all touching the board of public works and their contracts that this board of audit could do was to audit claims under the contracts, and, as I said before, necessarily therefore claims of the parties to the contracts?

It has been argued all the way through that the authority of this board of audit and the authority of the commissioners in the preceding section were commensurate, that one was the complement of the other; that the commissioners on the one hand were authorized to do certain things, and that the board of audit on the other were authorized to audit their accounts; but this has no reference to what the commissioners were to do. The very first line of it demonstrates that. The section provides for "a board of audit to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded and unsettled debt of the District of Columbia and the board of public works;" nothing else. Not what these commissioners may do hereafter; not what they may incur hereafter. And why not? They have said, in a communication which they made to the public, that if they could not use 3.65 bonds to pay for what they were doing they had not anything to pay with, and therefore they jumped to the conclusion that they had the right to use 3.65 bonds. But the idea of the bill was that they were to do nothing but keep things as they were until the new law came in and they had the revenues of the District. The bill provided for their collecting the taxes, and enforcing the laws of the District through and by them.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Has the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts been called still further to the powers of the board of audit? I do not want to anticipate the Senator; but as I understand the powers of the board of audit, they include quite an important item which has not been stated, and an item which goes to consume a very considerable portion of the 3.65 bonds that have been issued; that is, unadjusted claims for damages which this board of audit was directed expressly to find upon.

Mr. DAWES. Exactly; "unadjusted claims for damages." What are those? Does that authorize the carrying on of these public works? Is such a contract or the doing of such a work an unadjusted claim for damages? Will the Senator from New Jersey be kind enough to tell me one of them, and then I can see what it is?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly I will, with the greatest pleasure. It has no reference whatever to carrying out contracts. The point I refer to has no reference whatever to the powers of the commissioners: but it has direct reference to what has become of the money, the $10,000,000 or $11,000,000 which have been spent, which is the question that we are interested in.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator read the connection in which that expression is used?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend read the fifth specification under the powers of the board of audit; I read the sixth and seventh:

Sixthly. All claims for private property taken by the board of public works from the avenues, streets, and alleys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; and seventhly, all unadjusted claims for damages that may have been presented to the board of public works pursuant to an act of the Legislative Assembly of the District of Columbia, entitled "An act providing for the payment of damages sustained by reason of public improvements or repairs," approved June 20, 1872, which last-named claims shall severally be examined and audited without regard to any examination heretofore made; and shall make a detailed and tabular statement of all claims presented, the persons or corporations owning the same, and the amount found to be due on account of each; together with a tabular statement, &c.

I understand the fact to be that some very considerable portion of the money which has been expended has been expended in payment of claims of this character audited by the board of audit, and consequently that much is to be deducted from what is charged to the commissioners.

Mr. DAWES. I did not go further than the fourth specification, because no discussion has arisen on the others. There are doubtless other provisions, such as has been read by the Senator from New Jersey. One is that they shall adjust claims for damages caused by the board of public works. Another is claims that were provided to be presented under a statute of the District; they are of course to be provided for; but the discussion arose on the fourth clause, upon the power of these commissioners to perform, under the fourth clause, the unfinished work of the board of public works, and for it to issue United States bonds. That there were unadjusted claims existing when the law passed, not that have arisen since, there is no doubt; unadjusted claims that existed for taking private property, for damages for altering grades of streets, and all those things. They existed. What is the burden of my argument is that it was existing liabilities which that covered; and will the Senator from New Jersey be kind enough to point out to me a liability that did not exist when this act passed that this board of audit had jurisdiction of?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understand that the board of commissioners had power to make contracts for the "protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator do me the favor to confine his remarks not to what the commissioners could do, but to what liability has arisen since that comes under the jurisdiction of the board of audit?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am very happy to let my friend frame his own question, but I claim the privilege of framing my answer, or else I will not interrupt him.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that they can carry on public works. That is the argument; but I again submit to the Senator from New Jersey, and I will read item by item all these seven clauses, and ask him under which one of them it is that any liability that is created by this board of commissioners since the passage of the act will come.

First, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates; secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works; fifthly, claims, for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or on behalf of the District of Columbia; sixthly, all claims for private property taken by the board of public works—

A dead board when the law passed—from the avenues, streets, and alleys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown; and, seventhly—

Which is the last—

all unadjusted claims for damages that may have been presented to the board of public works.

Now, with all due respect to the Senator from New Jersey, and with an apology if I seem rude in asking him to answer the question which I put to him, I have but to repeat that to my mind no language can be clearer than that, in pursuance of the manifest spirit and intention of this act, there was to be a division line between the past and the future. The past was to be assumed by this government; the future was to be provided for by a new government, and the interim was too be taken care of as best it could. Now, after they have audited these accounts and have made out their certificates what are they to do with them? They are to have bonds for them.

And the said sinking-fund commissioners are hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par for like sums of any class of indebtedness in the preceding section of this act named, including sewer taxes or assessments paid, evidenced by certificates of the auditing board provided for in this act.

Mr. President, that was the law; that was the manifest intent of the law; and when the law passed, if the people of this District and this country derived any satisfaction in the world from the passage of any law of this kind it was because they felt that by the passage of this act the old régime had passed away; there was a prospect of a better state of things, a new order of things; that, much as we had rejoiced and been made glad by these improvements here, they saw this District staggering under the load of debt that had been incurred thereby. They heard the mutterings of accusation and crimination, but they saw that an able committee, spending a whole session in investigation, had thought it wise to make this disposition of the past. They did not think, as was known in this body by the declaration of the chairman of the committee, but as was denied in the other, that they had obligated themselves, at once and without qualification, to pay this whole indebtedness; and the country was startled during the past summer when it was announced, not only that the official opinion of the Attorney-General was that these bonds were United States bonds, but that here was a power created under this law to issue just as many of them as they pleased—a power never entrusted by this Government before to any one man.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to make an inquiry of him?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say that the Attorney-General has given an opinion that there can be as many of these 3.65 bonds issued as "they," the Senator said, saw fit? I do not know who he means by "they."

Mr. DAWES. I am very happy to be corrected if I conveyed any such idea.

Mr. THURMAN. The idea that the Senator conveyed was that the Attorney-General had said that these commissioners could issue as many of these bonds as they saw fit.

Mr. DAWES. I will repeat what I intended to say, and I am glad, if I have left myself uncertain on that point, to be able to correct it. The people of the country were startled during the last summer by the announcement not only that the Attorney-General had given an opinion that these were United States bonds, but that there was a power here that could issue as many of them as it pleased; not that the Attorney-General had said so, but that, by the construction put upon the statute by those who were administering it—and I have their letter here before me, to which I will call the attention of the Senator from Ohio in a few moments, which can bear no other construction—it was a mistake to suppose that we had put an end to the contracts and schemes of that old government. I was saying that they did not so understand till then; and I venture the assertion that had it been stated in the House of Representatives, as it was stated here by the chairman of the committee of this body, that this was a bill to enact that the Government of the United States was to pay in a bond of the United States, without knowing what it was, all the indebtedness that been incurred by that government, it would not have obtained thirty votes in that House. I read on Friday what was said there; I venture to read it again:

Mr. LAWRENCE. Is there anything in the bill which commits Congress to the indorsement or the payment of the District debt?

Mr. WILSON, of Indiana. No, sir; I will call attention to that point in a few moments. I think I can show that the committee has been careful about that.

Then further on, and being further pressed, the chairman of the committee having this matter in charge said, in illustration of what I have stated in reference to the board of audit:

The bill provides also, as you will see, for funding all the floating debt; getting it in shape. Then it is provided in another section of the bill that the sinking-fund commissioners shall, when this debt has been audited in the manner indicated by the bill, cause to be issued a bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest, payable in fifty years, and that these various forms of indebtedness may be funded in that bond.

In reference to the question as to whether or not the Congress of the United States is pledged to the payment of these bonds, I will call the attention of the House to that provision of the bill. Here it is:

And then he reads it, and adds:

That is the only pledge given in this bill.

"The only pledge." That was true, and it was sufficient. It was "not so deep as a well nor so wide as a church-door," but it was sufficient. He believed, as he said, that the purpose of the board of audit was to audit and fund the floating debt that then existed. He so stated. I was not undeceived in this matter. I saw in the distance that the United States would sooner or later take this debt upon its shoulders. I did not intend, I did not desire, that it should come in this last year; and therefore I tried to make it appear, what was perfectly plain to me, that this only pledge was clear. But I was not permitted. The bill became a law precisely as it came from the hands of the committee. No rash amendment in either House spoiled its beauty, or clipped its wings, or crippled its strength; but in all its original beauty and power, as it was drawn by the ablest lawyers of the country we are told, it became the law; and it therefore answered more likely than if it had been amended, if perchance it had been the purpose of the committee, who say distinctly that it was, to put an end to this thing.

But now, Mr. President, how did this board construe it? I have before me a letter that they addressed to the citizens of this District a few months after they came into power, in which they distinctly say that this law legalized every one of the contracts of the old board of public works, and that they were authorized to carry out just as many of them as they pleased and pay for them in three-sixty-fives. They understood that all the effect of this bill, the struggle of the session, was to change rulers. It might have been a good thing; I give to them the benefit of my own belief that it would have been a good thing if that was all we could have done. Did not this mountain labor wonderfully if all that was obtained was that the governor and his aids and the board of public works had gone out and three new, fresh men had come in to carry out their policy, and that we had agreed that the Government of the United States should not only pay all the indebtedness that had been incurred but all that they too should incur? That I may do them no injustice, I read what they say themselves on the 13th of August, 1874:

First. We hold that by the act of June 20, 1874, Congress has recognized the validity of the contracts of the board of public works, whatever their defects in their origin or the manner of their execution, subject to the exception common to all codes of law, namely, that contracts fraudulently made are void, and that all contractors who shall elect to accept the provisions of the law as to the mode of payment prescribed therein secure to themselves all benefit.

Secondly. That the defects, if they existed, of excessive price, want of antecedent appropriation, or those involving the making of the debt of the District to exceed $10,000,000, were all known to the investigating committee and to Congress, and were covered—by the act of June 20, 1874, under which the commission was organized.

The defects were covered—

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator if that letter or a copy of it was embodied in their report or in any report submitted to Congress?

Mr. DAWES. I am not able to say as to that. I am reading their letter as published here to avoid apprehension, and enable them to keep the peace.

Thirdly. The commissioners, therefore, hold that the prosecution of any or all the contracts of the board of public works to completion is for them alone to decide. * * * You will remember that in rendering their decision the commissioners adverted to the fact that unless the act of Congress had provided for the payment for all future work under existing contracts in what are known as 3.65 bonds, it would have been impossible to have completed the sewer system or any considerable portion of the contracts for other improvements, as the making of new contracts would have compelled the paying of money, &c.

They congratulate the citizens upon the fact that now these improvements can be carried on and out as they were originally contemplated without their incurring any expense, for the Government of the United States has come in and assumed the obligation! Is that the entertainment to which we were invited? Is all we accomplished by abolishing that great government and providing a provisional government till we could make a new one, only that these new commissioners should carry out just as far as they pleased, to the boundary-line of the District, the grand scheme of internal improvements inaugurated by their predecessors, and that the Government of the United States would give its bonds for it? If even that were all, it would not be quite as bad as it is. They say that this act has legalized every one of those contracts. The act provides that the commissioners—shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts.

What does that mean? "Existing legal obligations and contracts" is the language, taking care not to ratify and make valid any contract which is not legal. The Senator from Ohio has said that we imposed upon these commissioners the duty to decide upon the legality of these contracts, and in his argument he seems to me to intimate that their decision is conclusive upon the question of legality. We did say that they must decide, and so far as their action is concerned between them and the contractors it is conclusive; but as to all other parties and all other proceedings it is not a binding judgment upon the legality of the contracts. It has no more effect upon the contracts than my judgment would have, except that so far as they were required to act at all they were to pass upon the legality. They, however, construed the law as having legalized them, and left the commissioners no choice but to carry them out, and left them the sole discretion, and that although the contracts had been made in violation of that stipulation of the organic act of the District, which said that the board of public works should have no power to make a single contract except in pursuance of an appropriation and after the appropriation had been made——

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not wish to prolong the argument, but I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that if I am not misinformed the board of public works had the sanction of the Legislative Assembly of the District in the approval of the general plan embraced in all these contracts, and that an appropriation was actually made by that body to cover these contracts.

Mr. DAWES. An appropriation of what? Of bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. An appropriation of money or bonds.

Mr. DAWES. Which?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know which, but of bonds, I think, to the amount of four millions.

Mr. DAWES. Does not a great deal depend upon which?

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Massachusetts will allow me to correct my colleague, I will state that he will find upon looking into the testimony taken by the committee of investigation that the board of public works submitted to the General Assembly what was called the comprehensive plan of improvements in the District of Columbia, which it was estimated by the board would cost $6,000,000. The Legislative Assembly cut it down to $4,000,000 and, as modified, approved it. The board of public works paid scant respect to that and involved the District in a debt of about $12,000,000, if my recollection is correct.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the Senator from Ohio who has just taken his seat whether each one of these contracts had for that particular contract an appropriation of money?

Mr. THURMAN. O, the appropriation was in a general way; it was not a specified appropriation for each contract, by any manner of means.

Mr. DAWES. What was the appropriation that was made?

Mr. THURMAN. Four million dollars.

Mr. DAWES. In money?

Mr. THURMAN. It was provided how it should be paid by a loan act. They were to make improvements to the extent of $4,000,000 and the means were provided to raise four millions. I may be mistaken in saying that the board of public works went up to $12,000,000,

Mr. ALLISON. The $4,000,000 were issued in 6 per cent. gold bonds and sold in Frankfort.

Mr. DAWES. Then, Mr. President, it was an appropriation of a promise to pay. That is what it was. I would ask the Senator from Ohio, if, in his opinion, that was in fulfillment of the stipulation of the organic act, that no contract should be valid unless made in pursuance of an appropriation and after the appropriation was made? They merely appropriated that they promise to pay, that an obligation existed. They had no real appropriation, for they had not the money.

The Senator from Ohio nearest me [Mr. SHERMAN] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] both were under the impression that this board of commissioners had, after all, made no new contracts except in a case where it was fair to say there might be two opinions; as, when a man had made a contract to put down a wood pavement and maintain it for three years and had failed, they held that it was in pursuance of the contract to take the wood pavement away and put down a concrete one. The Senator from New York said that there might be two opinions as to that, but beyond that there was no controversy. Suppose that to be so, under what clause in the authority of the board of audit could they audit the claim of the man who put down the concrete pavement in such a case? The commissioners had a demand under the contract against the contractor, but they could not liquidate that demand with a 3.65 bond. If they then incurred an obligation with a third person to put down a concrete pavement, under what clause, I inquire, could they liquidate that obligation with a 3.65 bond? I do not see it. I have in my hand their advertisement for bids for new contracts all over this city. Here is one dated Washington, August 31, 1874:

Sealed proposals will be received at this office—

until Friday, September 4, for the constructing or laying of lateral sewers, whether of pipe or brick, and house connections for the same. The work contemplated under this advertisment embraces all such lateral sewers and house connections not embraced in existing contracts as may be deemed necessary for the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, for the period of twelve (12) months, commencing with the date of contract.

And then it goes on to give details. Here is another under date of November 3, 1874:

Sealed proposals will be received at this office at twelve o'clock m., on the 7th instant, for grading, setting curbs, and laying brick pavements in the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Bids will be received only upon printed forms, which, with all necessary information, may be obtained upon application at this office.

I have here a number of others.

Mr. ALLISON. Who are those signed by.

Mr. DAWES. They are signed by "Franklin T. Howe, chief clerk," and dated "engineer's office, District of Columbia, Washington, August 31, 1874," and "November 3, 1874."

Now allow me to call the attention of the Senate to two or three of these contracts; and I would like those Senators who think that there have been no new contracts to do me the honor just this once to listen to me. I will take the contracts as reported by the governor of the District to the committee which took the governor's head off, and then the report of the same contracts by this commission in 1874, and then the report of this commission in 1875 of the same contracts, and then you will ascertain their history and their application. I only take two or three of them. On page 352 of the governor's answer may be found a contract, No. 561. It was estimated that there was required to complete this contract $2,500. There had been paid in certificates when the governor made this report $13,695, and he reported it complete. The commissioners in 1874 reported this contract, No. 561, on page 232, as incomplete. It had got unfinished in that time. They had paid then on it $19,480, total. "Estimated cost of completion, $83,966.20. Brought up by application of contractor to resume work and the petition of citizens for improvement." They reported this same work the next year, in 1875, and on page 376 of their report it will be found:

Contract No. 561:
Work done by commissioners since last report, $202,883.05.
Estimated cost of completion, $18,676.
Retaining wall required for the protection of the road and parapet-wall to prevent accidents.

Two hundred and forty thousand dollars, more or less, upon this contract. When the board of public works ceased they had pronounced it complete; it was estimated in the beginning at $2,500 for a MacAdam road only, and then turned into a change of grade and a change of walls necessary therefrom to maintain the grade requiring a cost of $240,000, and this upon a contract which the board of public works themselves had pronounced complete!

Mr. ALLISON. It is not completed yet.

Mr. DAWES. It is not completed yet. I would like to inquire of Senators under which head of this statute that comes, whether it is for the protection or the preservation of work already completed, or begun and not yet finished. Under which head is that?

Take contract No. 916, on page 328 of the governor's answer, a contract with John O. Evans. The contract is to "lay the Evan's concrete pavement on the carriage-way of B street northeast," up here on Capitol Hill, "from First street northeast to Second street northeast," just one square. The contract made by the board of public works was therefore to lay the Evans concrete pavement on one square on Capitol Hill, for which Evans was to have $8,256. That was the condition of this contract when the board of public works, who had power to make it, ceased to have power to do anything. Now how did it stand when the board of commissioners reported? In their report for 1874, page 244, they report it incomplete. "Estimated cost of completion, $10,163.34." In 1875 they reported on page 390, under their authority to protect and preserve this B street northeast, one square—

Contract No. 916:
John O. Evans, executor of William C. Murdock, (assignee.)

That is the same contract. Now, do not mistake this language. "Executor" here does not mean what it does in a probate court. William C. Murdock was not dead; he is not dead yet. "Executor" means the man who executes; John O. Evans executing this contract which was originally made to him and which he assigned to William C. Murdock, and it was to "lay Scharf pavement on B street north from First to Second streets east." But this is added:

Lay the Scharf concrete pavement on the carriage-way of the following streets, namely: Fifteenth street between Rhode Island avenue and S street northwest; R street between Fourteenth and Sixteenth streets northwest; Corcoran street between Fourteenth and Sixteenth streets northwest; Seventeenth street between Massachusetts avenue and P street northwest.

That is what they add to contract No. 916 by a new contract on the 20th of May, 1875. In order to protect and preserve B street northeast, up here on Capitol Hill, the contractor must do this work over toward Georgetown. Then on the 5th of July they added to it this:

Lay Scharf concrete pavement on the carriage-way of S street between Eleventh and Fourteenth streets northwest.

Then on the 5th of August they made a new contract with him under this No. 916, the same contract, extended it as they called it, that is, stretched it.

Lay Scharf concrete pavement on the carriage-way of Twelfth street between P and Q streets northwest; also take up and remove—

In order to preserve, in the language of the statute and in pursuance of their authority, the original work up here on Capitol Hill—

also take up and remove the cobble-stone in alley in square 248, and pave said alley with Scharf concrete pavement; lay Scharf pavement on N street between New Hampshire avenue and Twenty-first street northwest; and on O street between Fifteenth and Sixteenth streets northwest; on Fourth street between M and O streets; and on N street between Fifth street and New Jersey avenue; and on the carriage-way of De Sales street in square 162.

That was a new street, it appeared.

October 5, 1875, canceled so far as relates to Fourth street and Twelfth street west and N street north, and in lieu thereof contract 293 extended to include laying Scharf concrete on the north side of the Washington and Georgetown Railroad on Pennsylvania avenue between Eighteenth and Twenty-third streets west.

August 16, 1875, in order under the authority of law to protect, for that is the whole authority they had, they added to it a contract to "construct sewertraps at the northeast and northwest corners of Twenty-first and N streets northwest;" and so on. On this contract, the beginning and the end of which and the fulfillment and completion of which was to lay a concrete pavement on a single square on Capitol Hill, they made new contracts with this man to lay what I have read, and paid him for it in Government bonds $101,593.60.

Mr. KERNAN. In addition to the $8,000?

Mr. DAWES. I am not able to state that, but they say they will need $10,998 more to complete it; and yet these commissioners so construe the law that that is no new contract!

It may be a little curious to inquire why this contract, No. 916, originally made with John O. Evans, was assigned by him to one of his workmen under him, he constituting himself the man to execute the contract. I do not know why it was, but I can give one good reason. John O. Evans had laid miles of this wooden pavement under a contract to maintain it for three years, and it might embarrass John O Evans in getting this $101,000 of Government bonds if the work was done in John O. Evans's name; and therefore John O. Evans assigns his contract to one of his workmen, but executes the contract himself and gets it turned into a contract from Capitol Hill clear over to Georgetown. [Exhibiting a chart.] Here where this blue line runs is his square, and away over there where the red lines are were his new contracts, upon which he got Government bonds in the name of his workman, to whom he had assigned the contract, though he executed it himself, while he stood liable to maintain wood pavements here for three years, and a suit is now pending on that provision of the contracts.

I omitted in that part of my argument in which I said that these contracts were void because they were not in pursuance of an appropriation and after an appropriation had been made to state the clear meaning of that. These commissioners, in a letter made a part of this report, say that suits are commenced, or some of them, in which he has set up that defense, and that the court has in one case decided that for that reason these contracts are void, and that the opinion of the attorney himself is that it is a good and valid defense against them all; and that opinion is in an official communication made to these commissioners by their own attorney.

Now, Mr. President, if the unpleasant duty has, as is usual in my life, fallen on me to criticise friends, I want distinctly to have it understood that I neither bring any accusation nor believe any accusation is well founded against the integrity of the commissioners, but a most wide and alarming construction of a statute enacted by us, for the effect of which we are responsible to the country, has added to this debt between three and four million dollars; and these commissioners say that the only limit in carrying out this plan (a general plan the Senator from Ohio says, embracing the whole of the city of Washington from limit to limit on either side) is their own discretion, and that they could issue these bonds in payment of the contracts. As this bill stands there is no inhibition upon them or the board of audit. Whatever there was upon it when it came here has been stricken out by vote of the Senate. An amendment is pending which will prevent the continuance of these plans and these purposes. Upon what ground that can be supported by those who believe that this construction is right I cannot understand; for, if this construction is right, here are valid contracts that cannot be stifled or claims under them extinguished by any such amendment; but that it should be upon this bill, I can very well understand would command the support of those who believe that this construction is erroneous.

Now, sir, they are out. They were issued, though, on an erroneous construction of this law in good faith by these commissioners and under what they believed was its true construction. They have mingled with the other bonds, and they bear upon them the impress of the United States. They must be taken care of. They must be so taken care of that the United States shall not suffer the mortification of seeing her own bonds discounted at 12 or 13 per cent., as they are at this moment.

Starting out with the firm conviction that it was my duty to, so far as I was concerned, provide for these bonds, I have felt it my duty to show to the country that when we passed this law it was not in the contemplation of those who voted for it to give any such construction; but in the discharge of a function difficult and delicate by gentlemen brought here for a temporary purpose, and supposing at the time they were only to stay but a brief period, they put a misconstruction on the law and these bonds have gone forth. That being the case, I for one feel it my duty not only not to question them by legislation here but to give my sanction to them, so that hereafter by proper provision of law they shall stand, as they must ultimately stand, upon the same footing with the other bonds of the United States. That is the occasion and that is the motive which has prompted what I have had to say. Feeling astonished at this construction, feeling it utterly impossible to accord with it, seeing the consequences which would follow from it if we provided for these bonds and put them upon the proper foundation without animadversion upon it, for we should thereby sanction and authorize it, I have been constrained to say what I have said to the Senate. I have done so from a sense of duty.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I did not vote for the law which is under consideration. I was not in the Senate when it passed, but should have opposed it earnestly if I had been here. It was not, as I am advised, in any respect a party measure, but received largely the votes of Senators on both sides of this Chamber.

Mr. THURMAN. What law is the Senator referring to?

Mr. MORTON. The act which was passed providing for the issue of these bonds.

Mr. THURMAN. Only one person in the Senate voted against it.

Mr. MORTON. I will then consider it as having the full indorsement of my democratic friends. My friend from Ohio referred to my opposition to the bill introduced by the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] to provide a District government, upon the ground that it abolished the suffrage in this District. I opposed it distinctly upon that ground; and I suspect that it commended itself to the favor of my friend from Ohio because it did abolish suffrage. I would have opposed the law that was made two years ago, which we are now considering, upon the same ground. The error is fundamental; it took from the people of this District all control of their domestic affairs, however trivial or unimportant in their character. It is at variance with the whole spirit and nature of our Government. Here are 150,000 people who have just as much natural right, and there is just as much propriety in allowing them, to control their domestic affairs as the people of any State or the people of any Territory. It is true the Constitution says Congress shall have exclusive legislation over this District. That meant to the exclusion of any State. The District was to be ceded by States under the Constitution, and then the exclusive legislation passed to Congress, excluding all State authority. But it was always considered consistent with that power to allow the people of the District to govern themselves in their domestic affairs. Congress by the Constitution is to govern the Territories; but it has always been considered constitutional for Congress to provide for the people in the Territories governing themselves, and that is in accordance with the spirit of our Constitution. When we abolished suffrage in this District and took upon Congress the entire government of this District, 150,000 people, it was in my judgment a blow at popular government, and came especially in the wrong place and at the wrong time; and I shall never cease to protest against it. Popular government is gone here now, and I think for many years to come, at least for several years to come; but it was an error against which I shall never cease to protest when I have an opportunity.

Mr. President, there is one consequence following it; and I call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to that particular thing. I understood him to assert the duty of Congress to govern this District to the exclusion of the people of the District. When Congress assumed the government of this District it assumed all liabilities; it became the moral and the legal duty of Congress to provide for all those streets, not only to build them where they were necessary, but to keep them in repair. When we took the entire government we took the entire obligation, and we must carry it out. If these streets get out of repair, these wooden pavements rot out, these concrete pavements break up, we, having deprived the people here of all control over them, must see to it ourselves that they are repaired. It is not a question now whether the board of public works exceeded its authority or not. We took the city as we found it, and we are now bound to take care of these streets and the property here. You cannot throw it off on the people; you have rendered them powerless; they have no more political rights than the people of Russia. This day they cannot govern themselves in the slightest degree; and when you have placed them in that position you have taken on yourselves the duty of providing for them as they ought to be provided for, such as they would have liberty to provide for themselves if they had the power of self-government.

So, then, whether there ought to be bonds issued to repair these streets or not, the Government of the United States is under the solemn duty of repairing them. In a few years many of these streets will be impassable if they are not repaired. Here is Pennsylvania avenue, that I have not traveled over in six months, almost impassable; you cannot travel over it with any degree of comfort. So it is with other streets. There are many streets here that in the course of a year we cannot pass over in a carriage. The Government has placed itself in the position of repairing these streets and must do it if it exercises ordinary good faith toward this people.

So much for the law as it stands. It is no favorite of mine. I believe that in every point of view we ought to have given to this people, as was done before, the right of self-government in all domestic matters, Congress reserving to itself the control of everything pertaining to the public property here.

Now, in regard to these 3.65 bonds, they are United States bonds, and we are bound to provide for them for two reasons: First, because we authorized the making of these bonds; and, second, because the people could not help having them made; and, again, because the people have no means of paying them or providing the interest. They cannot tax themselves; they cannot pay the interest. We have created the bonds, and we must provide for their payment. For that reason they are United States bonds in substance. Again, the Government has given this pledge:

> And the faith of the United States is hereby pledged that the United States will, by proper proportional appropriations as contemplated in this act, and by causing to be levied upon the property within said District such taxes as will provide the revenues necessary to pay the interest on said bonds as the same may become due and payable, and create a sinking fund for the payment of the principal thereof at maturity.

First, the Government is pledged to appropriate money to some extent to pay the interest and principal; next, it is pledged to levy enough tax on the people, and of course that includes the collection of it, and it includes the application of it to pay the balance of the principal and interest. The Government is, therefore, pledged for these bonds just as much as it is for the five-twenties; and the mere form in which they are made, whether made by the Secretary of the Treasury, signed by him, or signed by the sinking-fund board, makes no sort of difference. These bonds are in substance and effect the bonds of the United States, and we are bound to provide for them.

Mr. President, while I did not approve of this bill in the main, I approved still less of this bond provision. Unsophisticated as I was, I could not for my life see how the Government could propose to pay these contractors in a 3.65 bond. If we recognized the contracts as being valid and that these men had a claim, if we made no other provision for paying these debts than to compel these contractors to take at its face a 3.65 per cent. bond, I confess it always did look to me like repudiation. It is now worth sixty-nine cents on the dollar. It would only be worth seventy-nine or eighty at full computation. Here contracts were made to be paid in legal-tender notes, in the money of the country. We make no provision for paying these contracts. We say to these contractors: "You must take this bond or we now give you nothing." We do not say that we repudiate, that we will not pay you some time, but we do that in substance because we make no other provision. We offer them a bond worth seventy cents, and offer them nothing else. If that had been done by a State or if it had been done by a corporation, it seems to me there would have been but one opinion about it; but it was done by Congress. Some of these contracts may have been taken at big prices, some may have been taken at low prices; some at fair prices; but if we recognize the sacredness of a contract at all, we are bound to carry it out according to its terms. I thought this was repudiation when I first heard of it, but my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said it was not. I believe he was in favor of the law. I thought, therefore, after all it must be right, and yet I cannot see it to save my life.

Mr. President, here is a bond that is depreciated because it draws a low rate of interest. Now shall we not depreciate it further if we throw out the intimation in the concluding part of this bill that some of these bonds have been illegally issued? Who can tell what bonds have been improperly issued? How can the holders or purchasers of the bonds know? If we say here now or intimate that some of them have been illegally issued, then we depreciate the value of all of them; and they are low enough already.

When this question came up on Friday, I was inclined to accord with the view adopted by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] in his construction of this law; I thought there was much force in what he said; but after considering it further, and looking at the whole law together, I have come to the conclusion that the construction given to it by the Treasury officers and by the commissioners themselves was probably the correct one. I call the attention of my friend from Massachusetts to the language of the second section, which he quoted in regard to the authority of these commissioners to make contracts:

But said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the fathful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District.

That is the first point upon which they are authorized to make a contract—to carry out the valid laws of the District. I suppose there is a law in this District authorizing ordinary street repairs, authorizing the making of a new street or a new pavement where there is none. Therefore, they would have a right to make a contract to carry out that law, entirely independent of the board of public works or of any pre-existing contract. Then they have authority to make contracts to do something else. What is that?

To the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts.

That is one member of the sentence. If they find an existing contract or obligation, it may be that there has been no work done upon it at all; it may be that the work has not commenced upon the street; but if there is a legal contract for the work, then the commission has the power to make a contract to carry that out, as I understand. That is entirely independent of the question of the protection or preservation of work that has been already begun. If a legal contract exists it is binding upon the new commission, as it was upon the old government, and they have the power to make a contract to carry it out. That is the second condition. Then there comes another:

And to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act.

That is the third condition upon which they have the right to make a contract, to protect or to preserve work already done that may not have been completed at the time of the passage of the act. Here are three distinct conditions on which they may make new contracts: the first entirely independent of old contracts, the second to carry out contracts upon which there may have been no work done at all, the third to finish unfinished work and take care of that which has been constructed. Now, I come to the other question, in regard to the character of contracts for which certificates may be issued and 3.65 bonds taken by the contractors; and here is where my doubt arose the other day on hearing the argument of the Senator from Iowa. Let us consider that for a moment.

That it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works, hereinafter specified: First, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates; secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created, for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works.

In the first place, under this last head the claim must have arisen out of a contract made by the board of public works. "Claims already existing or that may hereafter arise." That is to say, if a contract has been made by the board of public works upon which no work has been done, and the work is hereafter to be done, it comes under that head. If it is unfinished work but has been abandoned and they go to work to finish it, that comes under this head. The question then is, what is the nature of the contract made by the board of public works? If by that contract the contractor was to keep the street in repair for three years and failed to do it, and, under the contract, the board of public works or this commission would have the power to repair the street and to charge the amount to the contractor, it would be a case arising under a contract made by the board of public words, and in that particular I thought the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts was not conclusive.

Mr. DAWES. Here is the contract. It does not authorize them to go and repair the work and charge the cost to the contractor by any means. It requires him to do it, and, if he fails to do so, he breaks his contract; and they have a claim on him arising under the contract.

Mr. MORTON. If I understand it, I think that amounts to precisely the same thing. I think the principle of law is rather familiar that where a party is called upon to do a particular thing by his contract, and the other party gives him notice and requires him to do it and he fails, then the other party in interest may do what the first party was required to do and charge the cost of it to the other party and make him pay it.

Mr. DAWES. I understand that to be the measure of damages. I understand that the measure of damages that the party can collect of the other for a breach of contract is what it would cost to put the work in repair; but that is not his right under the contract. He does not obtain that under the contract, but that is the measure of damages, because the contract is broken.

Mr. MORTON. I think the distinction becomes very shadowy in that case; it becomes, as we say, very thin. If a contractor may be called upon by this commission to repair the street in question, they make formal demand of him, the street must be repaired, the public convenience requires it, he fails to comply with his contract, the commission then go to work and repair the street themselves, and it can be said in equity, and I think in law too, that the commission are doing it as his agent and can hold him responsible for it.

Mr. DAWES. And pay themselves with a 3.65 bond for doing it? That is to say, the government can do this as the agent of the other man and pay themselves?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; precisely, because it is work arising out of a contract made by the board of public works. I am not responsible for the terms of the law, but that is law.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the Senator from Indiana how much pay they would get by giving their own notes to themselves for it? They have a right as the agent of the contractor to go themselves and do the work and then pay themselves by giving themselves their own obligation. That is the argument.

Mr. MORTON. I cannot see that the distinction my friend makes is one of substance. I see the technical point at which he is driving, but I submit this as the broad proposition involved in this controversy: Here is a contract made by the board of public works for building a certain street; the contractor is to keep it in repair for three years; he gives bond, as I understand, to that effect. When the street gets out of repair he is called on to repair it, to comply with the contract. He refuses to do it. The people cannot wait until the commissioners sue upon the bond and collect the money and apply it. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says the contract expressly authorizes the board of public works to do the work in such a case; but I am supposing that it does not; I am putting it on broad principles of law and equity, independent of a special provision of that kind. The contractor fails to comply with his contract; the public requires the street to be repaired; the commissioners go forward and do those very things that the contractor was required to do, and they charge the amount to him. Perhaps he does not pay it; but the work has to be paid for. It arises under a contract made with the board of public works, and the 3.65 bond may properly be given for it.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator from Indiana will allow me, I will suggest that there is no doubt that these contracts contained in their ninth clause a provision guaranteeing the durability of the pavement for such a term, providing that if the contractor omitted repairing it within the time the board of public works might go on and do the work and charge the amount to the contractors. There is no doubt about that. But that has nothing to do with the power the Senator seeks to draw from it. But the question I wish to put to the Senator is this: Does he consider that it is in execution of the power reserved in that ninth clause of the contract for the commissioners to tear up a wooden pavement and put down a concrete pavement, a Russ pavement, or an asphalt pavement? Could they recover $1 from the contractor for any such thing as that under that clause of the contract?

Mr. MORTON. I will answer my friend from Ohio, if I do not forget it, after I refer to the terms of the contract. The Senator from Massachusetts I suppose overlooked this provision.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt that they can agree in a contract to do that, and then it would be in conformity with the contract to do it. The particular contract which the Senator has before him contained that stipulation, and therefore it would be in the power of the board of public works under that contract to go on and repair that particular street. I have no doubt about it under the contract, because they so agreed.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose the contract contained the provision, which I presume they all did, that if the contractor does not repair the pavement the board of public works may do it for him and charge him with the amount, I then come back to the provision of the law, and I ask my friend from Massachusetts if the money paid for repairing a street in that case is not a claim arising under a contract made by the board of public works? Very clearly it is.

Mr. DAWES. I have no doubt of that. I do not contend that that is not; but that is a contract provided for in the fourth clause.

Mr. MORTON. But I was making this point: That, independent of any such provision, in the absence of such a provision, if the contractor is bound to keep the pavement in repair and fails to do it after a demand has been made, the commission may assume to act as his agent in equity, make the repair for him and compel him to pay for it, and in that case the claim would be one arising under a contract made by the board of public works and come precisely with the terms of the law.

Mr. THURMAN. Permit me a word right at that point. They can go on and repair the work under this clause which authorizes them to go on and repair it; they can employ their own engineers, their own servants, their own laborers. They need let no contract whatsoever. Suppose they had done that. Suppose that, instead of letting a contract to make a new kind of pavement, they had simply gone to work to repair the street, employing their own engineers and their own laborers, as they could have done, and expenses were thereby incurred, could they have sold 3.65 bonds in the market to defray the expenses of that work; or could you pay every Irishman that worked there with his pick and shovel in a 3.65 bond? The Senator must see at once that the 3.65 bond clause has no application whatever to a power that is derived, not from the law, but from a provision in the contract of the board of public works.

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, I bring the Senator right back to this point. The 3.65 bond may be issued in payment of any claim arising under a contract made by the board of public works. The contract thus made by the board required the contractor to keep the street in repair; he violates the contract and the commissioners come in and repair it for him. Is it not a claim arising under a contract made by the board of public works? And, if it is, then the law expressly provides that 3.65 bonds may be issued for it. I take it precisely on the ground of my friend from Ohio. But now I come to the other question I asked him a while ago.

Mr. BAYARD. Has the Senator forgotten that there was a ninety-days notice to be given?

Mr. MORTON. Ninety days' notice of the repair to the contractor?

Mr. BAYARD. No; parties had to give notice of their claims, which were presented to the board of audit.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know how the ninety-days notice may affect the question, but I am discussing the broad question whether 3.65 bonds can be issued for such a claim, and I insist that it is conclusive that it comes within the language of law. But now I want to come to the point made by the Senator from Ohio, and I believe by my friend from Massachusetts also, upon this state of case: Under a contract to construct a wood pavement, the contractor being obliged to keep it in repair for three years and failing to do so, demand is made that he do it and he fails to comply, and then the commission go forward and repair the street by putting down a concrete pavement. The question was, inasmuch as they had varied the character of the pavement, as they had put down asphaltum instead of wood, could they give the 3.65 bonds for that work? I think I have shown conclusively that if they put down wood they could do it. Now my friend says they put down asphaltum, and can they do it? If it turns out, if experiment has shown, if experience has proven, that the wooden pavement is a failure, that it is cheaper to repair it with an asphaltum pavement than to repair it with wood, I insist that it is virtually within the power, and that the reason given why the bond can be issued in the one case and cannot be issued in the other is purely technical and does not go to the substance of the thing.

Mr. DAWES. I think that where the contractor has agreed, as in the blank the Senator has, that on his own failure to maintain a wood pavement for three years they may go on and do it for him, they may do that. Therefore they could do that because of the agreement, and any claim that they might have on him for doing that, that would be a claim that they would have on him under the contract, and in the language of the fourth clause as to the board of audit it would be one for which they could give a 3.65 bond; but it would be giving a 3.65 bond to themselves, because they are the contractor and he has agreed that they can repair it if he does not, under the contract; therefore they would be giving a 3.65 bond to themselves; but he never has agreed that they can go and put another pavement there.

Mr. MORTON. I think I understand my friend. He says that in that case it would be giving to themselves a 3.65 bond. I am arguing that these commissioners are not contractors; they neither do the work by their own hands, nor are they the contractors, and they would get the bond. I assume that they made contracts with others to repair this pavement; and therefore that point is not well taken. But I come to the other question, and on it I wish the attention of my friend from Massachusetts as well as of the Senator from Ohio. I will say that the contract was to make the pavement of wood; it has been made, but not well made; and it is to be kept up for three years. The contractor refuses to renew it; the board comes in and does it for him; but they choose to repair the pavement with concrete, and not with wood. If he will not repair that pavement, then they may repair it in the best and cheapest manner they can. If they choose to repair it with concrete, and not with wood, they cannot charge him with what the wood pavement would cost. As between the contractor and the commissioners, if they act for him and repair the pavement in his stead, but change the character of the pavement, they cannot charge him with a greater amount than it would require to put down the old pavement again. But as between them and the Government, I ask what distinction there is? There is no substance in it whatever. If the commissioners can issue a 3.65 bond for repairing the pavement with wood, and experience has shown that it ought to be repaired with concrete, and not with wood, can they not issue a 3.65 bond for the concrete? The distinction is without a difference, and when it comes down to that the argument is exhausted.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me call his attention to one idea that seems to have wholly escaped him? He bases the right of these commissioners upon these words:

That it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works hereinafter specified, namely: first, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates; secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works.

The last is the clause upon which he relies, and he says that the commissioners are vested by the second section with power to execute those contracts entered into by the board of public works. Well, what is it that the commissioners are authorized to execute? The commissioners are authorized to execute the contracts on the part of the government, what the government is to do. The commissioners are not authorized to go and do the work of a contractor by anything in this statute. What they are authorized to do is to perform those stipulations which the government of the District had undertaken to perform. That is one thing. But any right reserved to them in a contract is a different thing. That is not executing the contract on the part of the government. The board of public works never stipulated that they would make these repairs. They never bound the government to make them in default of the contractor. They only reserved the right, which they might exercise or not, to make them and charge the contractor with them. Therefore the making of these repairs in the case supposed by the Senator is not the execution of any contract which the board of public works had made, for they never bound themselves to make one foot of such repairs.

Mr. MORTON. I think it is very clear that the distinction taken by the Senator from Ohio is without substance whatever. He says it is simply in carrying out a contract made by the board of public works, but he forgets that in the second section this commission is expressly authorized to make a new contract to carry out an existing contract. Am I wrong about that?

They are authorized to make contracts to carry out an existing contract, and where the existing contract authorizes either in terms or in equity the commissioners to make a new contract to carry it out, that is a claim arising under a contract made by the board of public works and there is no escape from it. You are to take all these sections together. You are not to construe one clause by itself, but construe the whole law so as to be in harmony. Here is the second section authorizing a new contract to carry out an existing contract. Then you go to the sixth section, where you find the board of audit are authorized to adjust "claims existing or hereafter created arising out of contracts made by the board of public works." Take it either way it makes no kind of difference. You must construe all parts of this law together. What was the idea? It was to provide the means of finishing these streets, of carrying out these contracts, and of keeping them in repair as provided by the original contracts. Take it altogether there is no sort of difficulty about it. That construction which would deny to these commissioners the power to issue these bonds in such a case is entirely technical and without the substance and meaning of the act.

Mr. MERRIMON. If it will not trouble the Senator from Indiana, I beg to ask him a question which I think goes to the bottom of this matter. It seems that three commissioners were charged with certain powers to accomplish certain purposes mentioned in the act. In addition to the three commissioners thus charged, by another section of the act the First Comptroller and Second Comptroller of the Treasury were charged with auditing certain classes of claims, six or seven in number. The three commissioners of the sinking fund—not the commissioners who superintend the affairs of the District of Columbia, but the three commissioners of the sinking fund—were authorized to issue these 3.65 bonds for any claim that might be presented after having been audited by the two Comptrollers.

Now, it seems to me that the three commissioners are made by this act the judge of what classes of contracts they may proceed to execute existing at the time of their appointment. The Comptrollers, in pursuance of the powers with which they are charged, are the judges of the character of the claims they must audit. When they have audited a claim, they determine (and they are the judges to determine) whether it comes within the purview of the statutes. If they audit claims and the commissioners of the sinking fund issue 3.65 bonds therefor, suppose they have erred or suppose they have exercised the power corruptly, yet the bond having thus been issued goes into the markets of the world, and can Congress or any other power question the validity of that bond? I ask the Senator whether or not in his judgment these bonds that have gone upon the markets of the world are not valid, and whether we are not bound to pay them, and whether we are not wasting time therefore in debating this particular bill?

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the Senator puts the case very clearly and unanswerably. The question answers itself. If there is even a doubtful construction of law, and officers appointed by the law to decide that question do decide that bonds can be issued in such a case, and the bonds are issued, the Government must pay the penalty if there has been a mistake about it.

Mr. MERRIMON. I call the Senator's attention to a decision of the Supreme Court touching certain bonds issued by a county in some of the Northwestern States, perhaps Wisconsin, where it was alleged—and that was the ground insisted upon before the court—that the commissioners of the county had exceeded their authority in issuing the bonds, that they ought not to have issued them, and indeed a citizen of the county might have restrained them before the bonds were issued; but they were charged with the power to decide; and after they had decided, and the bonds were put upon the markets of the world, it could not be any longer a question. The court decided that the innocent purchaser could not be bound by their defects of judgment or their corruption touching that matter; it was a matter within their jurisdiction. Now, whether these commissioners, either the commissioners to superintend the affairs of the District of Columbia under this act or the commissioners of the sinking fund, erred, the bonds having gone out, I confess I cannot see, as a legal proposition, why the bonds are not valid; and if we have to pay them we may as well do it. We may well consider whether we shall not stop them from issuing any more; I think it is probable we ought to do that.

Mr. MORTON. I think the Senator is entirely right in his legal proposition. The construction of this law has been settled by the officers of the Government, and it is too late now for Congress to question it. There might be a palpable violation of law, there might be a fraudulent violation that would justify Congress in interfering, but not a case of doubtful construction like this where it has been acted upon in this way; I think it is entirely too late to question it.

Mr. ALLISON. May I ask the Senator a question in reference to one part of his argument? I understood him to say that he voted against this bill.

Mr. MORTON. No; I was not here.

Mr. ALLISON. He would have voted against it if he had been here.

Mr. MORTON. I would.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose because of this particular feature?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; not because of this feature. My attention was not called to this then.

Mr. ALLISON. Now I understand the Senator to say that it was for these commissioners to issue a 3.65 bond with a view to repair streets, and that they are authorized——

Mr. MORTON. Not general repairs, but only in cases arising under these contracts.

Mr. ALLISON. All these contracts contained the same provision. If that be true, then the same good faith that required these commissioners to perform that act would prevent us from limiting the issue of these bonds to $15,000,000, because if these commissioners are required to repair these streets and issue bonds in order to do so, because as a Senator said it would be unjust to tax the property-holders to that extent, then we ought not to limit this issue at all until all these streets are repaired, so as to be preserved under the provisions of these contracts.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him? Does he advert to the fact that the three commissioners provided under the second section of the act have no power to issue a 3.65 bond at all; they have no power to direct anybody to issue a 3.65 bond? The commissioners of the sinking fund issue the bonds, and they are authorized to issue them for any of the certificates that are issued by the auditing board, consisting of the two Comptrollers.

Mr. ALLISON. That is true; but the board of audit and these commissioners construe the law alike, and they are in accord. As a matter of course the sinking-fund commissioners, when a certificate of the board of audit is presented, do not go behind that certificate. They issue bonds upon the certificate of the board of audit. But the board of audit and these commissioners have been in accord as to the construction of this law.

Mr. MERRIMON. But suppose they act conjointly, are they not charged with power to decide when a certificate of claim shall be issued? And when they had issued that certificate, and the sinking-fund commissioners have exchanged a 3.65 bond for the certificate and this has gone into the market, is not that bond binding?

Mr. ALLISON. We all agree to that. No one that I know of disputes the fact that we ought to pay the 3.65 bonds that have been issued.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then why not pass this bill and prevent these bonds going to protest to-morrow?

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that, but Senators insist that a construction shall be given to this law which, if unrestrained, would allow these commissioners to issue an unlimited number of millions of bonds under the law as passed on the 20th of June, 1874; and it was to call the attention of the Senate to their construction of this law that I adverted to it in the beginning. Now it seems that I have been entirely mistaken, according to the great lawyers of the Senate, gentlemen who construe this law, and that these commissioners under this section, whether creating the board of commissioners or the board of audit, have no limit whatever upon their authority. I wish to wash my hands of any such construction as intended originally by the committee that reported the law.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to add that if those commissioners have acted unwisely, whether from one consideration or another, we can put a stop to that by an amendment to this bill three lines long. If it shall be suggested by anybody (and I believe nobody has made that suggestion yet) that the commissioners have acted corruptly, we can hereafter call them to proper account.

Mr. MORTON. I am glad of the question asked by my friend from Iowa. I do not know whether he was in when I said that when this argument was opened I was inclined to adopt his views in regard to the construction of the law; but on full and further consideration I think a fair construction had been given to the law. Now, I want to refer to the question put by him. He said the construction I gave to this act——

Mr. ALLISON. I referred to all the gentlemen.

Mr. MORTON. He says the construction put by this commission authorizes those officers of the Government to go on and issue 3.65 bonds to the amount of millions. I suggest that there is one limitation, and that is that they cannot go any further except on contracts or claims arising out of contracts made by the board of public works or contracts made to carry out, in the language of the law, existing contracts or obligations.

Now, I come to the 3.65 bonds. I am willing to put a limit on the 3.65 bonds. While this new commission is bound to execute the valid contracts of the old government, when we swept away the old government and put a new one in its place we did not repudiate. We could get clear of existing contracts by doing that. You can change the form of government, but you do not get clear of contracts in that way. You may change a monarchy to a republic, but the republic is bound to pay the debts made by the monarchy; and so, if you change a republic to a monarchy, the monarchy must succeed to the debts made by the republic. When you swept away the former government here and put this commission in its place you are bound to carry out the contracts of the old government if they are legal. Now, I am willing to stop the issue of 3.65 bonds; but when we do that, inasmuch as the legal obligation to carry out existing contracts still remains, we are then bound to appropriate money to pay them directly, instead of issuing a bond for the obligation; and that is what ought to have been done in the first instance. I know my distinguished friend from Iowa had some hand in making the law; but I have said frankly that I think the 3.65 arrangement was a mistake in the beginning. Now how is it? These commissioners make a contract to carry out an old contract. A new contractor knows he has got to be paid in a 3.65 bond worth only sixty-nine or seventy cents to the dollar. He makes his bid accordingly, and the Government is finally bound to pay a principal 30 per cent. more than the actual consideration received. I say that it is a bad bargain.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to ask my colleague whether under this law it is his opinion that the commissioners have the power to make a new contract to carry out an old one that may have been abandoned?

Mr. MORTON. Let me see. They have power to make such a contract, it is very clear, because they have power to make contracts in these cases, first, to carry out "the valid laws enacted for the government of said District." That is entirely independent of any question of contract. Second, "to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts;" and, again, "to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

Mr. McDONALD. Now under the second clause does my colleague hold that, where an old contract has been abandoned by the contractor, for instance, these commissioners have the power to make a new contract for the completion of that work?

Mr. MORTON. They have the power to make it, but whether they have the power to issue a 3.65 bond for it is another question.

Mr. McDONALD. Does my colleague think they have the power to make a new contract to complete that work?

Mr. MORTON. That is beyond dispute.

Mr. McDONALD. Then will not this involve this conclusion, that these commissioners have the power under that law to complete the entire original plan of improvements as the old board of public works of this city had designed?

Mr. MORTON. I would say to my colleague that that would be the spirit of this enactment, in my opinion.

Mr. McDONALD. I think it was not the spirit of the act.

Mr. MORTON. I think it ought to be the spirit of the act; but, upon the precise point where a contract had been abandoned and they make a new contract to finish that street, they undoubtedly have a right to make such a contract, because the law expressly gives it in these terms; but whether the payment for that contract would be a claim arising out of a contract made by the board of public works may be a question upon which there would be two opinions.

Mr. McDONALD. I will ask my colleague this further question, whether under that third clause the only power of this board is not to do such work as may be necessary to preserve work already done?

Mr. MORTON. Or to finish streets that are incomplete. I will read the language of the act again. They have power to make a contract for "the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

Mr. McDONALD. That is for "protection or preservation."

Mr. MORTON. Suppose a contract had been made, a street had been plowed up, and whatever had been done by the workmen would be lost provided the work be not finished; clearly they would have the right to go on and finish the work in order to prevent the loss of what had been done. That would be the preservation.

Mr. McDONALD. Where a part of a street had been contracted to be repaired under an old contract, would they have a right to make a contract for the improvement of the balance of it?

Mr. MORTON. Very clearly they would, if by not finishing it that which had been done was to be lost or if the street would be left in a bad condition by it. I should say it was within the spirit of the law to allow them to finish that street beyond all question. My friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] refers me to the case of a sewer where, if it is not finished, what has been done will be lost. Suppose you take one of these streets where the grade has been cut down and it is not finished. Now, unless the whole street is put upon that grade it is left in a very bad condition, or suppose a part of the work has been done but not finished.

Mr. McDONALD. Is that completion necessary to preserve what has been done, to keep it from deterioration? That seems to be the purpose of that power.

Mr. MORTON. That would depend on the particular circumstances of the case. It would be hard to say how far it would be necessary to go to preserve; but suppose part of the work is done, and by not finishing it you leave the street in a bad condition; so as to make the thing complete and make it of benefit, you have got to finish the street; I should say that would come within the spirit of the law very clearly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question of the chairman of the committee before he proceeds?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. Is this interest payable to-morrow?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Does its payment depend upon the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It does.

Mr. THURMAN. Is there no law under which it can be paid unless this resolution is passed?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. None whatsoever to my knowledge. It depends on this resolution whether the Government goes to protest or not.

Mr. THURMAN. One further question. Is this the last day of January? [Laughter.]

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I will delay the Senate from passing this bill but a few minutes. I understand that three things are admitted, namely, that this work has been done, that it was necessary to do it, and that the Government of the United States is liable to pay for it, and it seems to me the conclusion is quite direct that we had better pay for it at once. But it has been stated here that the commissioners have greatly exceeded their powers. Permit one word upon that point, for I do not so understand this case.

It appears by the report made by the board of audit to the commissioners that there was due for indebtedness, not including work to be completed, on the 20th of June, 1874, $10,033,613.22. This statement is important, because this estimate made and reported by the investigating committee from the information they received made this item much less. Estimates of the cost of work, we have all learned, are very uniformly below that realized. Further, it appears that the commissioners have spent the sum of $5,200,000, and that sum is made up of three items:

First, completing contracts and preserving work. This they are clearly authorized by the act of Congress to perform. There is no question that they are authorized to make contracts, in the language of the law, "for the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed." Another item is that of repaving streets when the work was badly done and when by the contract the board of public works had a right to repave and charge the expense of so doing to the contractor. It is equally clear that the commissioners by the act had the right to make contracts for this repaving, for the act says that they have the right to make all contracts for "the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts." Here was an existing legal obligation that a street shall be paved and that the contractor should be subject to the expense of repaving if the work was insufficiently done. The commissioners would have been derelict in duty if they had suffered the period fixed by the contract to expire without thus holding the contractors liable under the contract.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to allow me to read a passage from the engineer's report in the report of the commissioners of the District of Columbia for 1874:

> Repairs of wood pavements, which are to be charged to contractors, the term of three years after their completion not having expired, and requiring a cash advance by District government, $31,649.42.

Then there are three other items, amounting altogether to $57,941.77, which the District commissioners report to Congress here that they have to pay out of the treasury in cash. Those items have been paid in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is no doubt that the sum suggested was then known to be necessary, and as the pavements gave way other and larger sums in addition to the $57,000 became requisite.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the Senator will allow me, it shows, however, at that time—that is, in 1874—at the session of Congress after the commission was organized, that they did not consider they were authorized to pay in 3.65 bonds. These 3.65 bonds have grown on the country and grown on the commissioners since that time.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It makes no particular difference whether they are paid in 3.65 bonds or in cash. They have collected taxes and revenues in this city—some $440,000—and applied them to paying the interest on the fund in the hands of the board of the sinking fund. They might have applied it in cash to the streets. You cannot get more than there is. There is no intimation that both cash and bonds have not been faithfully applied to the work and to the debt.

But that is not my point. My point is that this $5,200,000, which the commissioners have expended is made up of three distinct items, each one authorized by this law:

First. The protection of work and the finishing of incomplete contracts.

Second. Performing contracts which contractors have made default to fulfill.

Third. A sewer, which I believe was a new work which arose out of the exigencies of the situation, and which, if it had not been constructed, I am informed, would have been disastrous to the city. That is also authorized by this act in the words which authorize them to make "such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District."

The District had no municipal government other than the commissioners, and to say that they could properly have seen diseases and floods injure the city and its people without giving relief is at least unreasonable, when the act says that they have a right to make all contracts to carry out any valid existing law. It says in effect that they shall have power to do all they can to preserve the health and the safety of the city. Therefore, under these three heads the commissioners had full power.

Now, a word as to the amount expended on these three items by the commissioners. In the two items of sewers and of carrying out contracts in which default had been made by contractors there was expended $1,200,000 in bonds, but in money only $840,000, for the bonds were at a discount of 30 per cent. The amount which was expended by the commissioners in protecting improvements and in finishing incomplete contracts is $4,000,000 in bonds, but in money, making the discounts, only $2,800,000. Our committee reported to us that they thought this work could be done for $1,300,000, but they were mistaken, as most men are in making estimates, and that is all there is in this case.

Mr. President, we ought to look at this subject as it is and fairly recognize our obligations. The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have exclusive jurisdiction over this District, and that Congress shall have like authority over all places purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings. Therefore Congress has the power by the Constitution, if it is thought wise to do so, to assume the same exclusive jurisdiction over this District that it has over forts and arsenals.

On the 16th of July, 1790, a law was passed accepting ten miles square of the Potomac as the District for a permanent seat of Government, and over which the United States had the right to assume control. A commission was, under the authority of that act, appointed to determine what part of the District the Government would purchase for its own use. That commission selected the territory within the limits of the city of Washington as that portion of the District which they deemed necessary for the use of the United States. A deed was made by the proprietor of the soil on the 29th of June, 1791, for the portion of lands so required, and contained certain trusts; among others, that the lands were conveyed for a Federal city, with such streets, squares, and parcels and lots as the President of the United States for the time being shall approve. So the President of the United States had the right to select just such lands for lots, reservations, parks, avenues, and streets as he saw proper, which all became the exclusive property of the United States, and to them the United States has to-day a fee simple. The question arose, and it was adjudicated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Van Ness vs. The City of Washington, in 4 Peters, that the United States holds all the streets and reservations, not as streets are held by other cities, but in fee simple. The deed of 1791 provided that after the Government had selected such part of the land as it desired, there should be a fair and equal division of the remaining lots among the proprietors, and a conveyance thereof was to be made to the original grantor. You will see how absolute the control of the United States over the city is by observing the terms on which the conveyance was to be made to the original grantor.

The deed says:

> But the said conveyance to the said grantor, his heirs or assigns, as well as the conveyance and purchase, shall be on and subject to such terms and conditions as shall be thought reasonable by the President for the time being, for regulating the materials and manner of the buildings, and improvements on the lots generally in the said city, or any particular streets, or parts thereof, for common convenience, safety, and order.

So we see that the United States was to determine of what material and of what style and for what purpose the buildings in the city should be erected, even on that part of the territory which did not belong to the United States. This Government took this city as its own for a Federal city. It owns the streets and parks and reservations in fee simple, and it has control over the improvements to be made and over the buildings to be erected, and the Government should be ready to make it a capital fit and proper for a great nation. In November, 1800, when Congress first assembled here, Mr. Adams congratulated the people on having a permanent seat of Government, and said:

> It is for you, gentlemen, to consider whether the local powers of the District of Columbia, vested by the Constitution in the Congress of the United States, shall be immediately exercised. If, in your opinion, this important trust ought now to be executed, you cannot fail, while performing it, to take into view the probable situation of the territory for the happiness of which you are about to provide. You will consider it as the capital of a great nation, advancing with inexhaustible rapidity in arts, in commerce, in wealth, and in population, and possessing within itself those energies and resources which, if not thrown away or lamentably misdirected, will secure to it a long course of prosperity and self-government.

Mr. President, I have never met an American citizen coming to this capital, no matter of what party or from what section of our country, who did not rejoice in seeing the improvements which have been made in these avenues and parks and public buildings. No one makes a greater mistake than he who thinks that Americans are a mean people. They are proud, generous. They do not wish that the 140,000 people of this District, 40 per cent. of whom are poor, should be at the expense of maintaining a capital for them. There is more magnanimity in the people of this country than that. What Congress should do is to fix a fair rate that the people of this city should be taxed; let the sum thus raised be paid into the Treasury of the United States; and under the direction of the United States, under its exclusive legislative power, let the United States from time to time perfect and beautify this capital in which every citizen of the Union has a property and has a pride.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not rise to enter into this debate. I do not think debate in order. I do not think the proposition admits of debate. It is the last day, well-nigh the last hour, of grace when the credit of the United States goes to protest, and the Senate of the United States is indulging its fancies in regard to the conduct of its public servants whom it has invested with a discretion, and speculating as to whether it has been worthily exercised or not without a particle of proof on this subject. That is the Senate of the United States in the year of grace 1876. What are we asked to do? What are we expected to do? Provide for the interest falling due to-morrow on the 3.65 bonds. Why? Because we said we would do it. Because we issued a 3.65 bond in payment of the debts which we had contracted and got persons to take them at seventy cents on the dollar, and are we here to tarry? Are we here to allow them to go to protest by indirect, inconclusive, collateral statements on the subject when by no possibility have we any information which would enable us to come to any correct judgment upon it? What has this bill proposed? Some gentlemen have shrunk back from this proposition, as if the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate was about to take two hundred and twenty odd thousand dollars out of the Treasury of the United States. I think that is the general impression in the Senate even now. Do we propose to lay our hands on a dollar? No, sir! We propose to direct our servants, the commissioners of public affairs in this District, to pay that sum out of their revenue. Does any Senator object to that? No, we all mean to do that. That is precisely the thing to be done. That is our obligation. That is in the bond. That is in our faith, as solemnly pledged as it could be pledged. Let me read:

The faith of the United States—

Says the law officer of this Government for the second time, is what?

is pledged to the payment of the interest on these 3.65 District bonds as the same fall due and to the payment of the principal of the bonds when the same matures. There is no way short of shameless violation of the clearest principles of settled law and honest dealing that the Government can escape from the full payment.

When? Now, "when it falls due," which is to-morrow.

First. The United States themselves contracted the debt for which the bonds were given.

Second. The United States used the money or labor for which these bonds were given to improve their own property.

Third. The United States themselves authorized the issue of these bonds to secure their own debt.

Fourth. The United States by specific act of Congress pledged the faith of the nation for the full payment of these bonds, and thus induced innocent holders to take the same and part with value.

Fifth. The United States, to give additional credit to these bonds, pointed out the very ways and means by which they would securely provide the revenues to meet the interest and principal, the Government having absolute control over the ways and the means.

That is where we stand. Is there anything to talk about then? Is there a Senator here who expects to dissent from the proposition proposed by the Committee on Appropriations? I take it not. What then delays us here? Collateral matters over which we have no control. What are these? A wise man in the old time said, and it is written in some of the books which I will not undertake to quote, that there is a time and a season for all things. That implies that there is an expedient time, a proper time for things in their own place and in their own order. Is this the time and this the place for what has been exhibited here in the last three days? I should like to have same Senator answer that, if he can.

While we talk about collateral propositions the credit of this Government goes to protest. Mercantile honor is said to be a good deal, but what say you to the honor of a great nation? What do you think of that? What think you of allowing the sun to go down on such a proposition as that with our eyes open to that fact? And we are talking about what? We are talking about the probabilities or the improbabilities of misconstruction on the part of some of our servants who have been clothed with a discretion. We agree that we have such servants, and that we have authorized them to exercise a discretion in regard to the affairs of this District, and the question is what? That they have been corrupt? I have not heard that suggested. Is there any suspicion that they have been corrupt? Nobody states that. Is there any suspicion that they have been speculating? No; nothing of that sort. Then what? They have been improvident in the exercise of the power that we have given them. Suppose they have, how does that affect these bonds? How does that justify us to the bondholders who hold our pledge for the prompt payment of the interest and the principal as it falls due?

But let us look a little further into this matter of collaterals. Who are we who talk about the indiscretion of our servants? We are Senators here, members in the other House, and the most anomalous condition of things in relation to any government that exists on this continent or exists anywhere that I have any knowledge of at all exists in the District of Columbia. No man can tell to-day or guess even as to the relations between the Government of the United States and the people of this District. The people of this District do not begin to know or dream of the relations that they maintain to this Government. And how does that come to pass? From the earliest beginnings the Government has shirked its duties in regard to this District, the capital of the United States—the capital of a great people. It has been treated like anything else under heaven than as the capital of a great country. It has been run here by two little one-horse cities to a very great extent down to a recent period, and in what may be called in the country part of it by a sort of commissioners' court, and we have been content to allow it to drag in that sort of way, and whenever so long as within my recollection an appropriation has been called up here to take money out of the Treasury of the United States, plenty of persons have been found on this floor to say, Let them do it; let these cities do it; why should they not pave these streets; why should they not pave these avenues; why should they not ornament these squares, why should they not light these streets? It all comes, Mr. President, from a lack on the part of Congress of a due interest in the District of Columbia. But that is not the worst of it. We have not only neglected our duty in defining the relations which exist between this Government and the people of the District, but on all occasions, whenever that question arises, we indulge, I will not say in the most absurd but in the most liberal criticism upon the conduct of any man belonging to us who is connected with the affairs of this District. Now tell me, Senators, if you can, where we were when the foundations of the earth were laid. Tell me if you can where we were when all this monstrous usurpation was going on. Where was my honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] in 1871 when the District of Columbia was put under a territorial government and when these extraordinary powers were delegated to a board of public works? Did he raise his clarion notes then to warn us of evil? Was anybody found to be suspicious and chary of their powers? No; nothing was said that I know of. There was no stern protest, no prophet then either of good or evil in regard to what was about to be done. It is said there were the most extraordinary and astounding powers given to the board of public works. Who did it? We are the men. "And Nathan said to David, thou art the man!" We did it.

Senators seem to forget that for every deed done or attempted touching upon this District we are responsible. We feel as if we had liberty to be as glib-tongued and denunciatory and uncharitable toward any one who undertakes to exercise a law that we enact as if he were a convicted felon whenever he comes here to render his account, and we throw suspicions over his conduct. More than that, we allow ourselves indirectly to throw suspicions over our own bonds and pledges. That is what we do constantly. Sir, if undue authority, as it has been said here to-day in no measured terms, was given to the board of public works, the Congress of the United States is responsible and ought to be held responsible for it, and if these people are to be maligned on account of an exercise of an extraordinary power, we are the last men who should undertake to revile them for that, who should undertake to call them to an account for a large exercise, a liberal or enterprising exercise, of authority. That it was extraordinary is undoubtedly true, in a general sense. I do not go at all near the question of how they exercised that authority. That government has been gone over to a very large extent here to-day, altogether outside of this question. I have this, however, to say on that point. There is such a thing as having a question concluded. That question is concluded, so far as Congress is concerned. Congress, on a probable suspicion or a probable belief that something was wrong, that there had been an exercise of extraordinary power, two years ago raised a committee, a joint committee of both Houses. It was an able committee. They undoubtedly faithfully and with great ability attended to that duty. They examined the whole scope of the authority which these men had exercised, and they reported upon it, and Congress knew what it was. That whole subject, so far as any action upon this question or upon any question which may arise out of it, I take it, is concluded. Neither branch of Congress will desire to go over that ground again, I trust.

Now, it is said there has been a very extraordinary exercise of authority on the part of the present board of commissioners. I do not go into that. That is not necessary to this subject; and I only allude to it to show how entirely aside of the whole thing it is, and I allude to it simply in reference to the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations. I would have no apology for referring to it at all except for the action of the committee on this bill. This bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, directed these commissioners to pay this interest as it fell due out of the funds in their hands. But it went further. It said:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited.

Mr. President, remember that this bill comes from the Committee on Appropriations, whose duty it is to make appropriations to meet the demands of the service, but whose duty it is not to inquire into the character of that service. It will be seen that while this was a direction to pay the amount of interest due on these bonds, it went a step further, and provided that there should be no further issue of bonds. That involved a condition of things over which this committee had no control, and of which it had no intimate knowledge. Whether that was consistent with the obligations of the Government or not the committee could not tell. It was an important consideration. It turns out, however, that if you keep that provision in, it prevents the carrying from certificates into bonds of between $800,000 and $900,000 which have been audited, audited by a board of audit created by Congress, audited in the discharge of a duty. It was a matter of pledged faith with the claimants that when those claims were audited by this board of audit and carried into certificates they should be carried into bonds. It was just as much an obligation to carry them from certificates into bonds, in my judgment, and just as much a matter of faith on the part of the Government to do that, as it is to pay the interest on these bonds; and for that reason the committee recommend the Senate to strike it out.

The next proposition was:

And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

That was another proposition calculated, as anybody will see, to asperse the whole body of these bonds. The committee had no information on that subject, none whatever. They had no time to make inquiry into these facts; and, as it seemed to the committee, in spirit and in effect it was in derogation of that good faith which the Government ought to observe in regard to these bonds. The committee recommended the Senate for those reasons to strike it out. That is the way the whole matter stands; and I beg that the Senate, without further delay, will proceed to discharge the duty which it owes to the holders of these bonds, not to appropriate the money but to direct these commissioners to pay the interest to-morrow, which is the day when the obligation of the Government is complete.

Mr. OGLESBY. Mr. President, debate ought to close on this bill, I suppose, but if it were not so late and the emergency so great I would venture to resort to a very wise custom of this body and propose, as I think I might most expediently do, a reference of this whole subject to the Judiciary Committee. I think if there ever was a subject in this body that needed to go to that committee this is one of them. It is a question peculiarly of the construction of complicated and intricate law which has been debated before this body for the larger portion of two days, and I venture to make the assertion with some hesitation that it is not understood now. If no other good will come from this debate at least this will. Much as the American people admire the capital, the splendid outgrowth of its original genius, much as they would like to see the streets paved, ornamented, and finished up with jaspar shining stones; fondly as the admiring citizens of this great realm turned to its majestic capital, this much good at least has been done by this debate; that it will direct public attention once more, and for the third time, to a most unwholesome subject. If there was anything that was disgusting in the nostrils of this people two years ago it was the administration of public affairs in this city. Extravagance had been carried beyond human endurance, and the country stood aghast at the extravagant expenditure of money over these streets and around these public squares. To-day every portion of this country is agonizing under the cramps and twinges of hard times; all over this land to-day this great people are feeling poor and depressed; bankruptcy breaks out from every corner of the land; and in such an hour are we to be entertained here with glorious descriptions of this magnificent capital and its gorgeous, grand, and resplendent future?

We were told when the committee brought the bill in, which was passed on the 20th of June, 1874, that one million three hundred and odd thousand dollars would be necessary possibly to carry out the projected schemes of street and internal improvement here. I confess that when the report comes in here and informs me of the fact—and informs the country, to which country I must be responsible, and this republican party must be responsible on this question, for I am one of that party, and responsible to that extent for national legislation—I am appalled at it, that in addition to $1,300,000 estimated two years ago over $3,000,000 more in the last eighteen months have been expended here, and the people of the United States are expected to stand as guarantors for its redemption and final payment.

I listened with some consternation, as did the Senator from Iowa, to the argument carried forward for an hour this morning that these bonds had been legally issued; that there was no limitation upon the right of the commissioners to issue them, and that, as they had been issued under a proper interpretation of the law, so they must be legally binding upon the country in the future. Plain to me it was, and plain to the Senator from Iowa, that this thing would never stop, under such an interpretation, until God in his wrath would put an interdict upon it. Upon this technical construction of law, a law construed for three commissioners appointed to take the place of that odious government gone out of existence, I differ from the Senator from Indiana. I voted for the bill reported here by the joint committee of the two Houses, in order to get rid of the government that had brought such distress in its administration upon the finances of the people and disgrace upon the country; and I supposed, when the commissioners would come in and take the place of the old government, we would at least have to confront in the future no more of what I believe the public will regard as extravagant, if not inexcusable, expenditure of the public funds.

Now, I am as far from making any unjust comment upon these commissioners as any one. I have no other opinion about them than the very best; but it is possible for the commissioners to misunderstand law and misconstrue the statute, and it seems they have done so. I am glad that this debate has come, although it has taken time, and I (who now perhaps am most unprofitably consuming time) am glad that the debate has arisen, that the attention of the country has been directed to the subject, that we may by law stop the issue of another bond. If no other remedy shall be within reach, at least we will have that much left. If we are to leave these statutes to be construed and men to act under them in the atmosphere of this city, I do not expect the amount of bonds to be issued will be much less than a hundred million dollars. [Laughter.] They are going on at railroad speed. The wonderful Keely motor will not develop power enough to stop this thing unless Congress now puts its foot upon it.

This debate will do good. I have been saying of this expenditure of money by this city, that that money is to ultimately come out of the Treasury of this nation. Look at these streets to-day leading by the mile in every direction with here and there along the border magnificent residences, but here and there in other places such structures and places of habitation as are worthy only to adorn a mud-road in the State of Arkansas. [Laughter.] Handsome highways, fifty, eighty, and a hundred feet wide for miles and miles stretch out here for the accommodation of this poverty-stricken people, as they are often described to be; shop-keepers, we are told in another breath, living from hand to mouth. I wish to know what these people, who are mere shop-keepers as they are called; the poor, and distressed, and humble, who cannot support a government, want with such magnificent streets. Why beautify the city for the accommodation of these people who cannot pay taxes, or do not to any considerable extent? Let them come down as the people of the West, and the East, as for that, have come down. Let them come down to the plainer walks of life. Let them live as the balance of us live now in straitened circumstances, with a due regard to the purse-strings, and for a while dismiss the hope of subsisting upon expenditures from the National Government, or, what is equal to it, a guarantee that the Government will pay interest on the bonds and will provide a sinking fund for their ultimate redemption. This Congress and this nation to-day stands pledged for every one of these 3.65 bonds, if they have been legally issued. We are their backers and indorsers, and will have ultimately to pay every dollar, for this city will never pay a dime; it is not able to do it. I believe from the symptoms all around, ever increasing and never diminishing, they have no such expectation. Somehow or other it is made impressively manifest that the national Treasury is ultimately to share and shoulder the whole responsibility. It therefore becomes us for the future to move cautiously, and I think move arbitrarily, in regard to all expenditures hereafter to be made for this city and District.

The American people are a generous people. The American people are a public-spirited people. I believe with the honorable Senator from New Jersey that they will go as far as any nation or people on this globe to beautify and adorn their country; and they will, I suppose, in the future be, as they have in the past been, liberal in recognizing expenditures of public money under the judgment of Congress. I have no doubt of that, but just now and for a few years yet to come I beg leave to say that they are also a judicious and a discriminating people, and when other cities are falling into bankruptcy, when other communities are pressed down by a lack of employment of their industries, when everywhere, all over the land, there is stagnation, dullness, and starvation, it is no time to entertain such people by grandiloquent discourses about this magnificent capital. No, no; the quicker the lids of the volume shall be closed upon the fancy sketch of this proud capital the better the people of our Republic will feel and the wiser we will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. BAYARD. Let that amendment be read.

The Chief Clerk read Mr. ALLISON'S amendment, which was to add to the joint resolution the following proviso:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

And also the amendment to the amendment, to add:

And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I am not willing that this resolution shall pass without some remarks on my part, which I have been prevented by the length of debate from making heretofore. The day is now far advanced, and I shall propose presently that the Senate adjourn, and that the amendment of the Senator from California be printed, that we may understand it. It may possibly cover the ground of an amendment which I wish to offer myself, and if, on examination, I find it does, I shall probably accept it in lieu of the one I meant to propose.

Something has been said in regard to this interest being payable to-morrow. It is known that the House of Representatives has adjourned to-day. The Senate has stricken out the proviso of the resolution as it came to us, and we have every reason to suppose, from the adoption of it by the House, they will not assent to the resolution minus the proviso which they passed there. Therefore, I do not think there is any such thing as going to protest to-morrow or the next day upon the interest on these bonds.

There is cause for this Congress to pause in regard to further expenditures respecting this District, and I would be prepared, and am now prepared but for the length of the day's session, preferring to discuss this subject to-morrow, to show that there is reason why we should not be in haste to provide for interest upon the bonds which have already been issued, without an accompanying protest to save the obligation which the Government has already created in respect of these debts of the District of Columbia. It is true that these bonds of the District have been issued under the authority of the Congress of the United States, and that the Congress of the United States has pledged itself to provide by proper appropriations in a certain ratio, and by revenues to be drawn from taxation upon the property of the people of this District, for the payment of the interest on these bonds, and for providing a sinking fund to pay the principal at maturity. That is all so; and in doing so the Congress of the United States have acted as agents for the people; and if there shall be shown to them probable cause for examination before the performance of these obligations, according to their letter, then I think they should take time to consider that probable cause.

I do not desire to-night to prolong this debate, and have said thus much merely prior to submitting a motion to adjourn, in order to answer the objections to an adjournment without the passage of this resolution. The Senate will see and understand that the passage of the resolution here in its present shape will not suffice to have this interest paid without the action of the other House, and that House having deliberately expressed its intention of passing this resolution only subject to a certain proviso, it is not to be predicated that it will instantly agree to-morrow to the amendment now made by the Senate. A friend has just now showed me the RECORD showing the adoption of the amendment of the committee of the Senate, striking out the proviso accompanying the resolution from the House. It was taken and decided without a division, by what vote I know not, and it was not until special inquiry was made that I knew that the amendment of the committee had been adopted. It was done, I am very sure, without the knowledge of a large part of the Senate. All those whom I spoke to had no idea of it, and were surprised when they found such was the case by examining the RECORD. Desiring to say something to the Senate on the subject, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope not.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 30.

Mr. McDONALD. I would ask the Senator from Delaware to withdraw his motion to adjourn, that I may move that the Senate go into executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate is dividing.

The negative being put, the noes were 22.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken.

Mr. MORTON. Before this vote is announced I desire to state, if it is not out of order, that I will, on the conclusion of this bill, ask the Senate to take up and consider and dispose of the resolution in regard to the Mississippi election.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I hope that will not be done. We want to take up the centennial bill.

Mr. SARGENT. Before the vote is announced I move that the amendment I submitted be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Oglesby, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Withers—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Ingalls, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Bruce, Burnside, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, English, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Norwood, Patterson, and Whyte—12.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and thirty-six minutes) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 31, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the Journals of Friday and Saturday last.

Mr. PLATT. I call for the regular order. I hold that the reading of the Journal of Friday is out of order, as it should have been read on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order, and holds that the reading of the Journal was properly omitted on Saturday and for this reason: On Friday the House ordered that on Saturday there should be a session of the House as in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. That was the basis of the ruling of the gentleman [Mr. EDEN] who then occupied the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The Journals of Friday and Saturday last were then read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-five minutes after twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order during the morning hour is the calling of the States and Territories, beginning with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to their appropriate committees, not to be brought back into the House by motions to reconsider. Under this call memorials and resolutions of State and territorial Legislatures may be presented for printing and reference.

Before this call begins, the Chair will request the House to consent that the call shall proceed this morning until it is completed, without reference to the termination of the morning hour. That can be done only by unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The call will therefore proceed until all the States and Territories have been called.

LUMAN CASE, READING, MICHIGAN.

Mr. HENDEE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1606) granting a pension to Luman Case, Reading, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

WALL AROUND NEW DISTRICT JAIL.

Mr. HENDEE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1607) providing for the construction of a wall around the new District jail in the city of Washington; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

BEACON-LIGHT AT FORT CASSIN, OTTER CREEK, VERMONT.

Mr. JOYCE introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1608) to provide for the erection of a beacon or bug light at Fort Cassin, near the mouth of Otter Creek, in the State of Vermont; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. PARKER.

Mr. JOYCE also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1609) for the relief of William H. Parker, late a private in Company F, Second New York Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM FOG-SIGNAL, DUMPLING ROCKS, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. CRAPO introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1610) to appropriate money for the erection of a station and steam fog-signal at Dumpling Rocks light-house station in Buzzard's Bay, Massachusetts; which was read a firstand second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SLOOP ADDIE PARKER.

Mr. CRAPO also introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1611) authorizing the changing of the name of the sloop Addie Parker; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MARCUS S. REED AND QUINCY REED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1612) for the relief of Marcus S. Reed and Quincy Reed, of South Abington, in the State of Massachusetts; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

GEORGE W. BATES.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1613) granting a pension to George W. Bates; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

PORT AND HARBOR OF NEW YORK.

Mr. SCHUMAKER introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1614) in relation to the port and harbor of New York, and the waters near the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A. J. KANE.

CLAIM OF MISSOURI.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, also presented the memorial of the governor and adjutant-general of the State of Missouri, asking the action of Congress to secure an appropriation to compensate the State of Missouri for supplies furnished by her citizens to the Federal Army during the late war, and asked that by unanimous consent it be referred to the Committe on War Claims, and printed in the RECORD.

No objection was made.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, acting quartermaster-general of Missouri, respectfully begs leave to represent to your honorable bodies that the twenty-seventh General Assembly of Missouri, at its adjourned session, passed an act entitled "An act to audit and adjust the war debt of the State," approved March 17, 1874. That in pursuance of said act the governor of the State appointed two persons who, with the acting quartermaster-general as ex officio chairman, constituted a commission to examine, adjust, and audit the claims of citizens then on file in the quartermaster-general's office, or such as should be filed therein up to the 1st day of August, 1874, and known as irregular or mixed claims, arising out of the late war for the preservation of the Union. Upon the completion of the labors of said commission on the 30th day of September, 1874, the allowance of the claims of the character above specified amounted, in the aggregate, to $967,807.02. For this sum certificates of State indebtedness were issued to the claimants, which, by the terms of said act, were only to be paid by the State upon condition, and to the extent that the claims for which they were issued were allowed by the Federal Government and paid by said Government to the State of Missouri.

These claims thus audited and allowed by the State commission are exclusively for supplies furnished to the armed forces of the Union and State troops co-operating therewith, or for property taken for their use while they were actively engaged in suppressing the rebellion. The action of the State thus far in relation thereto has been mainly for the purpose of presenting them before the Federal authorities in such form as seemed most likely to secure from said authorities their final adjudication and settlement, according to their clearly-ascertained merits.

No argument is deemed necessary to show that our Government should render proper compensation for the property of citizens used in supplying the necessities of armies engaged in its defense for its obligation to do so is recognized alike in its organic law and its uniform practice. The act of July, 1861, to re-imburse the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States, and other similar enactments, looking not only to the re-imbursement of States, but to the compensation of individual citizens for property taken to meet the demands of the public necessity, furnish a sufficient assurance that our Government needs neither enlightenment as to its obligations in this direction nor a ready will to discharge them. It is under this assurance, thus created, that the claims of citizens of Missouri, as above specified, and recently audited by the commission appointed for that purpose, are now filed in the office of the Third Auditor of the United States Treasury.

It may be proper to state that the re-imbursement of Missouri, under the act of April 7, 1866, necessarily left a large amount of unpaid claims not then embraced in her account against the General Government, for the simple reason that there had not been sufficient time for their presentation with the proper evidence necessary to sustain them. Such, indeed, was the condition of Missouri during the period of our civil strife that the demands made upon her citizens to meet the exigencies of war will never be estimated to their full extent. It is well known that large and populous districts within her borders were entirely desolated by Federal military orders, and that uncomputed amounts of grain and forage, belonging to residents driven from their homes by the imperious behests of martial rule, were committed to the flames to prevent their use in the support of the enemy. In the frequent and hurried transit of Federal troops, their necessities, which knew no law, had but slight regard for the rights of property. Forage and supplies, whenever and wherever needed, were unhesitatingly seized, and often, through haste or design, no proper evidence of such seizure was left with the luckless parties made sufferers thereby. There can be no doubt but these claims of citizens of Missouri for supplies furnished and property taken for the use of troops employed in suppressing the rebellion, and which are now on file, as aforesaid, in the office of the Third Auditor of the Treasury, fall immeasurably short of their forced and voluntary contributions to the cause of the Union and the actual indebtedness of the Government therefor. Such legislation, therefore, from your honorable bodies as may be deemed necessary to authorize their examination, and also their allowance and payment, so far as their justice shall be clearly established, is earnestly and confidently invoked.

Very respectfully,

G. C. BINGHAM,
Adjutant-General of Missouri.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Jefferson City, Mo., January 24, 1876.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I indorse and join in the memorial of General Bingham, as above set forth, and trust that it may be the will of Congress to make appropriations for the payment of these claims which have been found by the commission to be due our citizens for supplies and commissary stores appropriated and enjoyed by armed forces engaged in the defense of the Union passing through and stationed in the State.

Very respectfully,

C. H. HARDIN,
Governor of Missouri.

AFFAIRS OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BUCKNER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolution; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas by the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, the late government of the District of Columbia was abolished and the government thereof transferred to three commissioners appointed by the President, with authority to enforce the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts of said District of Columbia, and to preserve and protect improvements then existing or commenced, and not completed at the passage of said act; and whereas the said act authorized and constituted a special board of audit to allow and certify all debts and claims then existing against the said District and the board of public works, which said certificates were made convertible into a bond bearing 3.65 per cent. interest per annum; and whereas at the time of the passage of the said act it was estimated that the said floating debt of said District then due and to accrue on account of improvements then contracted for and incomplete was about the sum of $8,306,000; and whereas it is alleged that the said board of commissioners have enlarged and extended said contracts, and caused a large amount of work and labor to be done not contemplated or authorized by said act, so that the amount of certificates now issued for said improvements is but little short of $15,000,000; and whereas it is alleged that many of said improvements made under the authority of said board were made in the interests of favorites and friends, and that a large amount of said certificates have been issued illegally and without warrant of law, and that corrupt and improper means have been used to obtain allowance of false and fraudulent claims, and that the subordinate accounting officers in said board of audit were largely interested in many of the claims allowed and certified by said board of audit:

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1795) to amend section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, also, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 57) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, providing for the levying of direct taxes according to the wealth of each State; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PLASTER CASTS OF EMINENT MEN.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, by unanimous consent, submitted a resolution relative to the purchase of certain plaster casts of eminent men; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

CASH BALANCES IN TREASURY.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, submitted the following resolution, and moved that the rules be suspended and the resolution adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish this House with a detailed statement showing the amount of actual cash on hand in the Treasury and the several depositories of the Government at the close of business on the 25th day of January, 1876, specifying how much thereof was in fractional currency, how much in legal-tender notes, how much in national-bank notes, how much in gold coin or bullion, how much in silver coin or bullion, how much in gold notes counted as cash, how much in coupons counted or held as cash, how much in called bonds counted or held as cash, and how much in any other items counted or held as cash, not specified above, and how many legal-tender notes are actually held to redeem the outstanding bank-notes of national banks to which United States bonds held for circulation have been surrendered, and whether the legal-tender notes received for the redemption of such national-banks notes are held as a special deposit or are or have been counted in the general cash balances reported, in accordance with the terms of this resolution, or in the monthly statements of the Treasury Department.

Mr. KASSON. Why not say the last day of the month, which accords with our mode of keeping accounts? Otherwise I must object to the resolution, because it will take a special account, requiring the service of many clerks for several days.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am informed that the cash balance is made up for every day in the year, and therefore I ask it for the day named in the resolution, as being quite as practicable as any other day.

Mr. KASSON. I think we had better have it for the last day of the month.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I think not; I think it is better to have it made up for some day past rather than some day in the future.

Mr. KASSON. This is the 31st of the month.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am informed it is made up for each day.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If my colleague [Mr. HEWITT] will submit to a suggestion, I think he has not included in his resolution of inquiry all the depositories of public money, and I presume he designs so to do.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I certainly do, and I think the resolution is broad enough.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. We are informed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, submitted to Congress at the beginning of this session, that there were at least $10,000,000 of coin in the Mint preparatory to issuing the fractional silver coin authorized by existing law. I think my colleague has not included the amount of coin in the Mint not issued.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I think by reference to my resolution it will be found to cover that point. It says "in the Treasury and the several depositories of the Government."

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I think that probably the Secretary of the Treasury will not include the Mint as one of the depositories.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am quite willing to include the Mint, and will modify the resolution in that respect.

Mr. KASSON. In this conversational way I wish to say to the gentleman that if I understand his resolution he asks for certain things that it will be almost impracticable for the Secretary to state in the general manner called for by the resolution. If the gentleman has no objection to allowing the resolution to lie over for a day, in order that we may ascertain whether it will not require a complete special count of certain branches of money, I shall be glad. My impression is that it will require a special count, and unless the gentleman is in haste I would be glad to have it lie over one day. There will be no objection to obtaining the information so far as we do not now have it. I know the Committee on Banking and Currency have obtained much of this information already.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I am told that the accounts of the United States are kept with a daily cash balance, in the same manner as the accounts of every good merchant are kept. If that be true, there will be no difficulty in furnishing this information. If it be not true, then we want to know how the accounts are kept, in order to provide a remedy.

The question was taken; and two-thirds voting in favor thereof, the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the rules be suspended and the preamble and resolution adopted which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the several railroad companies hereinafter named, to wit, the Northern Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Central Branch of the Union Pacific, the Western Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Sioux City and Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Texas and Pacific, and all Pacific roads or branches to which bonds or other subsidies have been granted by the Government, have received from the United States, under the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, the act March 3, 1874, and the several acts amendatory thereof, money subsidies amounting to over $64,000,000, land subsidies amounting to over 220,000,000 acres of the public domain, bond subsidies amounting to $——, and interest amounting to $——, to aid in the construction of their several roads; and whereas it is but just and proper that the Government and people should understand the status of such roads and the disposition made by such companies in the construction of their roads of the subsidies granted by the Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and are hereby, instructed and authorized to inquire into and report to this House, first, whether the several railroad companies hereinbefore named or any of them have, in the construction of their railroads and telegraph lines, fully complied with the requirements of law granting money, bonds, and land subsidies to aid such companies in the construction of their railroads and telegraph lines; second, whether the several railroad companies or any of them have formed within themselves corporate or construction companies for the purpose of subletting to such corporate or construction companies contracts for building and equipping said roads or any portion thereof, and, if so, whether the money, land, and bond subsidies granted by the Government have been properly applied by said companies or any of them in the construction of their road or roads; third, whether the several railroad companies or any of them have forfeited their land subsidies by failing to construct and equip their road or roads or any portion of them as required by law; and, fourth, that, for the purpose of making a thorough investigation of the several Pacific railroads or any of them, the Judiciary Committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers, and, after thorough investigation shall have been made, shall report to this House such measure or bill as will secure to the Government full indemnity for all losses occasioned by fraudulent transactions or negligence on the part of said railroad companies or any of them, or on the part of any corporate or construction company, in the expenditures of money, bonds, or interest, or in the disposition of land donated by the Government for the construction of the roads or any of them or any portion thereof, and for the non-payment of interest lawfully due the Government or any other claim or claims the United States may have against such railroad company or companies.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to suggest whether the reference of this resolution should not be changed by striking out the Judiciary Committee and inserting the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, which seems to me the proper committee to take charge of this investigation. As my colleague [Mr. LUTTRELL] is a member of the latter committee, he should consent, I think, to this change.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] accept that suggestion?

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir. I think the Committee on the Judiciary is the proper authority to pass upon the constitutional and other legal questions which may arise on the bills now pending.

The motion of Mr. LUTTRELL to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution was agreed to, there being ayes 119, noes not counted.

RETIREMENT OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether the commercial and industrial interests of the country do not require that the retirement and cancellation by the Secretary of the Treasury of legal-tender notes should cease, and whether common and equal justice to the whole people does not require that United States notes should be substituted for national-bank paper and applied in liquidation of the interest-bearing bonds, instead of the policy now authorized by law of substituting national-bank paper for United States notes; and that said committee be directed to report thereon by bill or otherwise at the earliest practicable moment.

Mr. COX. I believe this resolution simply contemplates an inquiry. I do not see any objection to sending it to the committee, as they are already charged with the consideration of this subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. The only object is to require a report from the committee on these points.

The motion to suspend the rules and agree to the resolution was adopted.

BUFFALO, BAYOU, BRAZOS AND COLORADO RAILROAD.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That it be the duty of the Committee on Ways and Means to inquire by what authority the Treasury Department of the United States paid the sum of $18,938.79, awarded to the Buffalo, Bayou, Brazos and Colorado Railroad Company, to any and what other persons, and by what authority, and when was such authority executed, whether before or after the issuance of the warrants, and what security has the Government against the second payment of the money; also, that it ascertain whether any and what officer of the United States was concerned in the scheme for getting possession of the money, and what means were employed; and that the committee report by bill or otherwise.

POLYGAMY IN UTAH.

Mr. PAGE moved to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Whereas it is alleged that there is a sect or organization in the Territory of Utah known as Mormons or "latter-day saints," so largely in the ascendant in point of numbers as to control the moral and social, as well as the political, destiny of that Territory; which has enacted laws in direct conflict with and in open violation of the Constitution and laws and set at defiance the civil and military authority of the United States; adopted rules and established customs totally repugnant to the recognized modes and forms of civilized life; under the sacred name of religion wickedly established and openly and shamelessly maintains the vile and degrading doctrine of polygamy or plurality of wives; a people who under specious pretenses have enticed order-loving, valuable citizens of the United States from their homes and families at the dead hours of the night only to assassinate them in the most cruel and heartless manner; procured, abetted, and perpetrated the most unprovoked, cold-blooded, and brutal murders of innocent and inoffensive men, women, and children, as developed by the late trial of one Lee, a Mormon, the frightful details of which must freeze every heart with horror; suborned witnesses, terrorized courts, and aided, sheltered, and protected the most notorious and infamous criminals; and whereas it is the duty of all the inhabitants of the United States to obey the Constitution and laws thereof and to respect the rules and customs of civilized life; and whereas the permitting of such high-handed and outrageous conduct on the part of these people is calculated to bring the Government of the United States into contempt and its enlightenment into disgrace among the nations of the earth: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That in the judgment of this House immediate steps should be taken for the enactment of proper laws to compel these people to obey the Constitution and laws of the United States; and that to this end the Committee on the Judiciary of the House be, and is hereby, instructed to report a bill at its earliest convenience to more fully establish the authority of the United States in said Territory, and thereby remove this foul blot from the civilization of the nineteenth century.

The question being taken on agreeing to the motion to suspend the rules, there were ayes 31, noes not counted.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution was not adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, to resume the consideration of the Military Academy appropriation bill; but I am willing to yield to several gentlemen who wish to present propositions for reference.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. ATKINS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, instructed to inquire whether or not the Union Pacific Railroad Company have forfeited their charter under the act approved July 1, 1862, or the act amendatory thereof approved July 2, 1864, with power to send for persons and papers, and to report to this House either by bill or otherwise.

HOMESTEAD AND PRE-EMPTION SETTLEMENTS.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (S. No. 34) to confirm homestead and pre-emption settlements be taken from the Speaker's table for reference to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is under a misapprehension. That bill has not been presented to the House, and is not on the Speaker's table.

PROTECTION OF HOME INDUSTRY.

Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent to present a resolution for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the industrial interests of the whole country are laboring under great depression; and whereas that country is best governed where the greatest good is done to the greatest number; and whereas that policy which encourages and stimulates the establishment of manufactures at home, thereby creating a demand for labor and a home market for the products of the soil, confers and increases the purchasing power upon the masses of the people; and whereas the history of this country proves that the greatest contentment and prosperity have prevailed when this policy has been adopted; and whereas the question of finance is but the question of labor, and the question of labor is but the question of protection; and whereas hundreds of thousands of laborers in the country are out of employment and in want and are looking to Congress to adopt some measures that will afford relief to the country: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to take into consideration the propriety and necessity of increasing the duties upon the importation of all products and manufactures which come in competition with the products and manufactures of our own country.

Mr. COX. I object to that resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the resolution introduced for reference or adoption?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman introduced the resolution for reference to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COX. Very well. I do not object to reference; let it be buried in the Committee of Ways and Means.

There being no further objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the rules be suspended and that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering the bill making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy at West Point.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOSKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The Clerk will read where he left off when the committee was last in session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For repairs and improvements, timber, plank, boards, joists, wall-strips, laths, shingles, slate, tin, sheet-lead, nails, screws, locks, butts, hinges, glass, paint, turpentine, oils, bricks, varnish, stone, lime, cement, plaster, hair, blasting-powder, fuse, iron, steel, tools, mantels, and other similar materials, and for pay of citizen mechanics and labor employed upon repairs that cannot be done by enlisted men, $12,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move in line 42 to strike out "12" and insert "20." so it will read "$20,000;" and I do it on this ground: The estimates for the repairs included in these items are made by careful and competent men at West Point, with full knowledge not only of what they expect to be done but what has been the demand in times past. The estimate was $22,500, and those gentlemen all unite in the statement that the Government property there cannot be taken care of for the amount reported in this bill. I hope gentlemen of the committee, unless they have better information than I have, will not resist the increase of the amount in this case, in order that the million of dollars' worth of property belonging to the United States at that post may be properly taken care of and the necessary repairs made.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I trust this amendment will not prevail. We called on the Department for a specification of the expenditures under that item in last year's bill. We found it had been contained in bills for several years past, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] and myself, the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, could not well conceive how so much money could be expended in annual repairs. A response to our inquiry developed the fact that a large amount of that money was paid in annual erections—not in repairs, but in erections—in the construction of residences with marble mantels and like large expenditures. If we appropriated in this item $50,000, I have no doubt it would all be expended. It has not been confined to repairs. Here are the items showing how it has been expended heretofore.

Mr. HURLBUT. Have them read.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. You can read the response if you want to; I do not propose to take up time. I trust the amendment will not prevail, as it was the judgment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] and myself that $12,000 was an ample amount, and in that recommendation the committee concurred.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of natural and experimental philosophy: For instruments to determine magnetic intensity and declination, $600; text-books, repairs, and materials, $400.

Mr HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I move to strike out "instruments to determine magnetic intensity and declination," and in lieu thereof to insert, "additions to the apparatus to illustrate the laws in mechanics, optics, and acoustics." The instruments named in the bill as it now stands were supplied in the appropriation bill last year, and were included here by mistake.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of French: For text-books and stationery for the use of instructors, $60.

Mr. HALE. I move in line 101 to strike out "60" and insert "$100;" to which I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I have no objection, if the gentleman thinks that increase is material.

Mr. HALE. Last year it was $200.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendment is all right.

Mr. HALE. I do not think one hundred too much.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For department of law and ethics: For text-books and stationery and books of reference for the use of instructors, $50.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I move to strike out the words "and ethics." Until lately the same professor taught law and ethics. Now there is only a professor of law, and the words "and ethics" should be stricken out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move in line 106 to strike out "50" and insert "200." The reason why I do it is this: This department of law as now established, is a new thing. It embraces military law, constitutional law, the law of nations, and everything of the kind applicable to the education of cadets. I am satisfied that an allowance of $200 will not be too much to fit up the department with the proper books.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I move to amend by making it "100" instead of "200."

The amendment to the amendment was adopted.

The amendment, as amended, was then agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For miscellaneous and contingent expenses: For gas, coal-oil, candles and wicking for lighting the academy, cadet-barracks, mess-halls, offices, stables, and sidewalks, $4,000; water-pipes, plumbing, and repairs, $1,500; cleaning public buildings, (not quarters,) $500; brooms, brushes, pails, tubs, soap, and cloths, $200; chalk, crayons, sponge, slate, and rubbers for recitation-rooms, $100; compensation of chapel organist, $200; compensation of librarian, $120; pay of engineer of heating and ventilating apparatus for the cadet-barracks, chapel, and philosophical academy, including the library, $1,500; pay of assistant of same, $720; pay of five firemen, $2,200; increase and expense of the library, books, magazines, periodicals, and binding, $1,000.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move in line 134 to strike out "1" and insert "2," so as to appropriate $2,000 for expenses of the library, books, magazines, periodicals, and binding.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I object to that.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For contingencies for Superintendent of the academy, $200.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I move in line 138 to strike out "200" and insert "$1,000." These contingencies are rendered necessary in the way of hospitality and courtesy which the Superintendent of the academy must extend to strangers, and I hope the committee will give consent to the adoption of my amendment. This is the centennial year, and probably more strangers of high military distinction from Europe and elsewhere will visit West Point than ever before in any one year, or, I may say, in any previous ten years. I do not think $1,000 is too much for the purpose. The expenses of the Superintendent must necessarily be increased, and I hope the gentleman from New Jersey will consent that for this year at least the sum of $1,000 shall be appropriated.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. When my colleagues and myself found this item in the estimates, "Contingencies of superintendent of the academy, $1,000," we were a little at a loss to know what that was intended to cover. We supposed it was some contingent expenses charged to him or under his direction in connection with the academy. And with our opposition to contingencies, being disposed to strike them out wherever we found them in the estimates, we made an inquiry into the purpose of this appropriation and for what it was designed, and we found that it was intended as an addition to the Superintendent's salary, in order to enable him to entertain friends or visitors at West Point.

Now, certainly this cannot be maintained upon any principle that I am aware of. When it is known to the members of this House that there is a good, commodious hotel on the point, and that there is another large, commodious hotel just outside the public grounds—Cozzens's Hotel—which are resorted to largely in summer as watering-places, any person visiting West Point who has the honor and feeling of a gentleman would never permit himself to be quartered on the hospitality of the Superintendent of the Military Academy, and ought not to be allowed to do it if he was willing. With all the facilities of accommodation which are at his command at the public hotels, it is not to be tolerated that he should go and quarter himself on the hospitality of the Superintendent of the academy, and it is an injustice to the Superintendent himself to have it understood that the Government furnishes him a fund for the entertainment of visitors. He would be constantly run upon and intruded upon if that idea went abroad, that the Government furnished him funds to entertain visitors at the academy. There are enough men of small ideas and mean enough in their feelings and habits to want to impose upon the Superintendent if they thought they could do it under the pretext that the Government furnished him funds for entertaining visitors. To encourage this idea would be bad policy and an injustice to the Superintendent himself. We have allowed him in this bill $200. I think the appropriation should have been stricken out entirely. It is wrong in principle, and I hope the proposed amendment will not be agreed to. The only amendment which ought to be made would be to strike out the appropriation entirely.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I think there should be either an appropriation of $1,000 or no appropriation at all. The board of visitors last year recommended an increase on that amount of $1,000. Many distinguished military men from abroad come accredited to our Government and are sent by our Government to West Point to examine into the organization of that institution. Now, sir, it is utterly impossible for this gentleman, the Superintendent of the Military Academy, to avoid entertaining those distinguished strangers in some way or other. The Government imposes upon him that duty, and you have no right to compel him to take the means of doing it from his limited pay.

I hope the appropriation will be enlarged this centennial year. You have been granting an appropriation of a million and a half of dollars for a celebration at Philadelphia worthy of this great people. Very many of the strangers who go there will go also to West Point. Many of the distinguished members of the commissions sent from foreign countries will do so. I hope the House will, at least for this year, give this amount to help the Superintendent to entertain the hundreds or thousands—I had almost said tens of thousands—of distinguished visitors who will be here from abroad, and who in all probability will visit West Point.

The question being taken on the amendment offered by Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, it was not agreed to.

The following paragraph was read:

For printing catalogue for library, $100.

Mr. HURLBUT. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "$100," and insert "$250."

One hundred dollars will not do the work which gentlemen are asking to have done. This is a catalogue printed for the benefit of the students and professors. The amount estimated was much higher—$500. I have limited it in the interest of economy to $250.

Mr. BANNING. I hope that amendment will be adopted.

The question being taken on Mr. HURLBUT'S amendment, there were—ayes 63, noes 64.

Mr. HURLBUT. A quorum has not voted. I ask for further count.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. If the gentleman will make the amount $200, I will agree to that.

Mr. HURLBUT. O, I cannot split on fifty cents.

Mr. BANNING. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will agree to the $200, and we will get it.

Mr. HURLBUT. Let us have the other.

Mr. BANNING. Would it be in order for me to move an amendment to the amendment, so as to make the amount $200?

The CHAIRMAN. It would.

Mr. BANNING. Then I offer that amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. Not while the committee is dividing on my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Until there is an absolute announcement of the result of the vote on the amendment an amendment to that amendment is in order.

The question being taken on Mr. BANNING'S amendment to the amendment, there were—ayes 52, noes 80; no quorum voting.

So (no further count being demanded) the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question recurs on the original amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

The question being taken, there were—ayes 72, noes 88.

So Mr. HURLBUT'S amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I move to amend the pending paragraph by striking out "$100" and inserting "$150." I think that is a fair compromise, and perhaps enough.

Mr. HURLBUT. O, no; that would not be enough.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, it was not agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I offer the following amendment to come in as an additional paragraph to the bill:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to detail competent officers of the proper staff corps to act as quartermaster and commissary for the battalion of cadets, by whom all purchases and issues of supplies of all kinds for the cadets and all provision for the mess shall be made; that all supplies of all kinds and descriptions shall be furnished to the cadets at actual cost without any commission over said cost, and one of said staff officers so assigned shall perform all the duties of purveying and supervision for the mess which is now done by a purveyor, without other compensation.

I desire to state some facts in regard to the interior economy of West Point with which gentlemen here are perhaps not conversant, and I do it in the interest of the young men in whom we are all interested. There is appointed by the Superintendent, or rather by the board of management at that post, a person called a purveyor. His business is to purchase all provisions and superintend the mess. He is not an officer of the Army; he is a civilian, and is paid out of the allowance of the cadets a salary of $1,200 a year, which, in my judgment, is an improper and burdensome exaction upon them. In addition to that, for a long period of time he has furnished all the supplies, embracing all articles of clothing and underwear, and everything else which the cadets are compelled to use are furnished by him and retailed out to the cadets at the commissary store at an advance of 10 per cent. upon cost. Sir, I do not think that is a good business for this Government to be in. We have an abundance of officers of these two classes of staff officers which are called upon by this amendment, and I am instructed by the Board of Visitors, who went to West Point last year, to present this recommendation. It is embodied in their report, if gentlemen have read it, and I offer it as an amendment to this bill and trust there will be no objection to it.

Mr. RANDALL. I quite concur with the gentleman in the propriety of the amendment and the object he has in view, but the use of the word "officers" would leave it discretionary how many should be employed there.

Mr. HURLBUT. O, I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. It will be better to say one or two, if two are necessary. I would like to hear the amendment read again.

Mr. HURLBUT. I did not intend to leave it discretionary at all.

Mr. HOLMAN. Two are named, a quartermaster and a commissary. Does not the gentleman think that one can do this work?

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly one can do it with proper clerks.

Mr. HOLMAN. The words occur twice in the amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have modified the amendment, and ask that the first portion of it be again read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to detail a competent officer of the proper staff corps to act as quartermaster and commissary for the battalion of cadets, by whom all purchases, &c.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope there will be no objection to that.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. There is no objection to that.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I desire to move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have still some amendments to offer. I move to add as an additional paragraph the following:

To complete one wing of the hospital, $42,000.

I hope gentlemen opposite will let us have a fair vote upon this proposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. The amendment, of course, is in order; but I trust, Mr. Chairman, that it will not be adopted. The whole subject of public buildings and appropriations of money for the continuation of public buildings has been referred to one committee of the House, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has been regarded as very desirable that all appropriations for public buildings should be embraced in one bill, so that gentlemen may see at once the nature and extent of the appropriations for that particular source of expenditures.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is an appropriation asked for, for the hospital at Fort Leavenworth. Does the gentleman propose to refer that to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. HOLMAN. This subject has been referred and would properly be considered by that committee, and for that reason and that only I do not think the amendment should be adopted. The gentleman may rest assured that the subject will be carefully inquired into and if this expenditure is necessary it will be reported to the House in the proper bill.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to have a vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now offer the following as an additional paragraph.

To carry on the system of sewerage, $8,000.

I do not know whether that subject has been referred to the same committee or not.

Mr. RANDALL. We do not think that appropriation necessary.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is absolutely necessary to the health and well-being of those employed at the post, and I would like a vote of the committee on the question.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. That matter is like the matter of the hospital, and estimated for under the head of buildings and grounds, and has been referred with the other to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment of Mr. HURLBUT was not agreed to.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I move that the committee now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration a bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, and to recommend that the bill, as amended, do pass.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded upon any amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not think any one on this side desires to detain the House by requiring a separate vote on any amendment. It is understood that the gentlemen on the other side intend to pass this bill as they have amended it in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were then concurred in.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Patrick J. Kennedy, praying the removal of the charge of desertion and the restoration of his name to the rolls of his company with allowance such as he may be entitled to from the various Departments of Government; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented additional papers containing evidence in support of the bill for the relief of Joseph Dunlap, of Council Grove, Kansas; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented the petition of Merritt Lewis, of Michigan, a disabled soldier, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have had sent to me by the secretary of state of Iowa a joint resolution of the General Assembly of that State, asking that Congress restore the rates of postage on third-class matter to the rates which prevailed one year ago. I will not ask to have the memorial read, but move that it be inserted in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

The resolutions are as follows:

Preamble and resolutions relating to postage on third-class mail matter.

First. Whereas the question of cheap postage to persons living remote from the lines of express companies, especially the rural districts, is of vital importance to the prosperity of the country and the convenience of the inhabitants: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives in Congress be requested to use their influence to have the postage on third-class mail matter restored to rates which prevailed one year ago.

That the secretary of state be instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Mr. WRIGHT also presented a joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, asking Congress to pass a law repealing so much of the revenue act as applies to stamps on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved by the house, (the senate concurring,) That our Senators be instructed and our Representatives requested to secure, if possible, an amendment to the laws of Congress so that revenue stamps shall not be required on bank-checks.

Mr. WITHERS presented additional papers in the case of B. D. Morton, late postmaster at Clarksville, Virginia; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. OGLESBY presented the petition of farmers and workingmen of Illinois assembled in convention at Bloomington, praying for the repeal of the so-called resumption act, withdrawal of national-bank circulation and the substitution of legal-tender circulation, with the privilege of conversion into a convertible bond; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORDON presented the petition of V. Dunning and other citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, praying that the estate of James L. Dunning, late postmaster at Atlanta, may be relieved from liability for certain sums of money alleged to have been embezzled from that post-office by certain money-order clerks therein; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMILTON. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands to report back sundry petitions of citizens of Michigan based upon the memorial of the Legislature of Michigan, asking the Congress of the United States to grant bounties to all soldiers of the late war. These petitioners suggest that the Government of the United States appropriate $200, in lieu of one hundred and sixty acres of public lands. I suggest that the petitions go to the Committee on Finance, if they see proper to act upon them at all. At any rate, I am instructed by the committee to report them back adversely.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I ask that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Public Lands will be discharged from the further consideration of the petitions, and they will be referred to the Committee on Finance, if there be no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 57) authorizing the payment of duties on imports in legal-tenders and national-bank notes, to report it adversely. I think the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] would desire it to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir; I would like to speak upon that subject at the proper time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am also directed by the Committee on Finance to report back the concurrent resolution proposing a common unit of money and accounts for the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, accompanied with certain facts and reasons for its passage; and I move that this statement be printed and the whole matter recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MAXEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to report back adversely upon the petition of V. Dunning, and other citizens of Atlanta, Georgia, praying that the estate of James L. Dunning, late postmaster at Atlanta, Georgia, may be relieved from liability for certain sums of money alleged to have been embezzled from his post-office by certain money-order clerks. After a thorough examination of the facts in the case by the committee, I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of that petition and that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 261) to remove the political disabilities of Daniel T. Chandler, of Baltimore, Maryland, to report it back. It appears that this gentleman was in the Army of the United States, but that his resignation was duly and fairly accepted. He went into the service of the rebellion, lived through it, and petitions in a respectful and honorable way to have his disabilities removed. We therefore report favorably upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 811) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1877, reported it with amendments.

UNSTAMPED INSTRUMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 785) to extend the time for stamping unstamped instruments, to report it without amendment; and as it is of a temporary character, I ask that it be considered now.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the stamping of unstamped instruments, documents, or papers," approved June 23, 1874, are by the bill extended to January 1, 1877.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. I see that the bill provides generally for extending the time.

Mr. SHERMAN. For one year.

Mr. WRIGHT. It provides for extending the time of an act that is now on the statute-book. The act thus extended has provisions in it saving the rights of third persons, I suppose?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator is familiar with the act which this bill extends.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am.

Mr. SHERMAN. This bill has been very carefully considered, and it is for the purpose of enabling parties interested in legal documents to put on stamps when by accident or design the stamping was omitted.

Mr. WRIGHT. All I wanted was to see whether I am correct in my recollection, that the act thus extended does preserve the rights of third persons which may have intervened.

Mr. SHERMAN. It does. This simply extends the old act, with which the Senator is familiar; for I know he took part in its passage.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I desire to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee. I do not remember the provisions of the act which is extended by this bill sufficiently; but is there not a provision by which in case a person may not be able to obtain stamps his paying any proper officer of the Government the price of the stamps shall have the same effect as if the paper had been stamped? In some sections of the country sometimes people are not able to procure the proper stamps.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the revenue laws before me now, but the act does contain a provision of that kind. The party can call on the proper collector for stamps, and if not furnished substitute their price. This bill simply extends the provision of the law which authorizes these instruments to be stamped one year further.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to inquire further of the chairman whether the State courts now recognize as valid the law which requires a stamp in order to admit papers as evidence? I had occasion in the month of April last to check the admission of evidence of the record of a deed which had not been stamped, but my State court ruled that the law was not constitutional, and admitted it in evidence notwithstanding the objection which I made and my citation of the law, which I produced from Brightly's Digest. Therefore it seems to me that if the State courts of the country are not to recognize this law Congress ought not to enact by statute that unstamped instruments may not be admitted in evidence, and it is unnecessary legislation to extend the time for stamping instruments.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I can say is that perhaps the State courts of some other States have more regard for the laws of the United States than they have in Delaware. But I know there is a necessity for this extension by the fact that the House of Representatives, from the Committee of Ways and Means which considered it, passed the bill and sent it to us; and I can see no objection to it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Our State court in Delaware acts in harmony with the position assumed by the courts in several other States.

Mr. MERRIMON. I believe that the State courts have generally held that Congress has no power to lay down a rule of evidence for State courts. This has been held not only by the State courts of Delaware, but by the State courts of Massachusetts, Kentucky, and other States; and I believe the rulings in that respect are uniform. But this legislation goes on another ground, as I understand it. It is competent for Congress to impose this stamp-tax and make it obligatory on whomsoever shall be interested in instruments to stamp them, and impose penalties; and if any one shall produce any instrument required to be stamped, without the proper stamp, he is subject to be indicted. I understand that the object of this bill is simply to extend the time where inadvertently papers have not been properly stamped, so that they may be stamped and thereby save this penalty and save the parties from indictment. In that view I think it very proper; but so far as it prescribes a rule of evidence for State courts, it is in-opportune, and I think the decisions of the supreme courts of the several States are uniform on that subject.

Mr. STEVENSON. I suppose that this bill does not contemplate a deed or anything which constitutes evidence in the State courts; for I do not know a court that has not declared the law in that respect unconstitutional; and I think the Supreme Court of the United States has expressly decided that it is not competent for Congress to tax the instrumentality or agency of a State court any more than it is competent for a State to tax the instrumentality or agency of a Federal court.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator will allow me, this bill does not require anybody to put stamps on any instrument whatever. It is no tax and no burden upon anybody whatever. It is not a tax upon any State court, but it simply provides that a person who holds deeds or papers that he desires to have stamped to secure the rights under them and avoid the penalties imposed by the revenue laws, may stamp them at any time during this current calendar year if he chooses to do so for his own benefit in a certain way; and to enable him to do so it extends the provision of a law that has been in force for six or seven years which enabled him to do it. It is a mere statutory relief for the purpose of accommodating parties who desire to attach these stamps.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not object to the bill. I supposed it was really to remedy just what the Senator from Ohio says. Still I do not recognize the power of the Federal Government to regulate or interfere at all with the reception of evidence in State courts; and I do not suppose this bill does do so.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-ROUTES IN TEXAS.

Mr. MAXEY. I am directed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas, to report it favorably. I will state that the Postmaster-General recommends the establishment of the routes indicated in the bill, and as the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reports favorably upon it, I would ask the present consideration of the bill. I know personally the necessity for the immediate establishment of these routes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas. The routes proposed to be established are from Paris, Lamar County, Texas, by way of Cotton Plant, in that county, and by way of Cooper, in Delta County, to Sulphur Springs, in Hopkins County, and from Bonham, in Fannin County, by way of Ladonia, in that county, and Ben Franklin, in Delta County, to Cooper, in that county; and instructs the Postmaster-General to furnish these routes with the necessary mail service.

Mr. SARGENT. The direction in the last part of the bill is unusual. Certainly it is not customary to direct the Postmaster-General to put service on specific routes. We never accompany with such a condition the establishment of post-routes. The usual policy of the law leaves it to his discretion upon evidence. I would like to inquire if this bill has been reported from the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was reported by a member of the committee, the Senator from Texas.

Mr. SARGENT. I see it relates simply to Texas. There are several other bills before the committee relating to post-routes which the committee have not had time to act upon. The ordinary method is to have such measures combined in one bill and reported to the Senate in that form.

Mr. MAXEY. With the permission of the Senator from California, I will say a few words. A new county, Delta, has been established out of the populous counties of Lamar and Hopkins. The records of those counties are essential to the transaction of court business in Delta County. Cooper now has no connection with any railroad. By the bill it gets the benefit of connection with the northern system, twenty-four miles north of Paris, and with the southern system, eighteen miles south of Sulphur Springs, which now has daily mails from Mineola. Delta is in the same judicial district with the county of Lamar and the county of Fannin, and hence the imperative necessity of immediate action. If the Senator from California desires, I will move to strike out the latter clause.

Mr. SARGENT. That is the motion I would make. I move to strike out the last clause in the following words:

> And the Postmaster-General is hereby instructed to furnish said routes with the necessary mail service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND OFFICE IN UTAH TERRITORY.

Mr. OGLESBY. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 279) to establish a land office in the southern part of Utah Territory to be known as the Beaver district, and for other purposes, to report it with an amendment. I do not know that there will be much more morning business before the Senate this morning. The bill is unanimously recommended by the committee, and it is also recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office. It is to establish a new land office in the southern portion of the Territory of Utah, where the people have been deprived for some length of time of the convenience of such an office. Therefore, if there is no serious objection, I would ask the Senate for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 279) to establish a land office in the southern part of Utah Territory, to be known as the Beaver district, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Public Lands, with an amendment in line 6, section 1, to strike out "thirty-ninth" and insert "fourth standard;" so as to read:

> Thence running north on the line between said Territory and the State of Nevada to the fourth standard parallel of latitude.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HITCHCOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 386) approving an act of the Legislative Assembly of Colorado Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 387) for the relief of John S. Friend; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PADDOCK asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 388) to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservation of the Sac and Fox Indians, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 389) for the relief of Edward Corselius and seven other persons, late members of the First Michigan Cavalry Veteran Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to say that the bill which I have just presented was introduced by my predecessor (Mr. Chandler) at the last session and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. I understand there is a memorial which accompanied it. I wish an order entered to take that memorial from the files and refer it to the Military Committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 390) to authorize the erection of a suitable building for a custom-house, post-office, and the use of the courts of the United States in the city of Jacksonville, Florida; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a tract of land at Key West, Florida, owned by Walter C. Maloney and wife; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 392) for the preservation of game, for the protection of birds, and in relation to dogs in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 393) for the relief of William G. Anderson; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to withdraw the petition of Thomas Worthington, of Ohio, from the Committee on Claims, with a view to its revision in form.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Anna M. Orme be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Lewis Johnson be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Betts & Nichols be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WEST, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Fanny A. Thompson be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion of Mr. NORWOOD, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Patrick Eagin be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. BOUTWELL, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Julius A. Pickering be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Patents.

TREASURER'S ACCOUNTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Treasurer of the United States:

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, January 31, 1876.

SIR: I beg leave to request that the bearer, Mr. David A. Ritter, a clerk in this Office, be granted access to the copy of the Treasurer's quarterly account for the first quarter 1873, on file in the Senate, for the purpose of correcting a transposition of titles of receipts as recapitulated on page 249 of that account.

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, respectfully,

JNO. C. NEW,
Treasurer United States.

Hon. T. W. FERRY,
President pro tempore of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that that request be granted.

The motion was agreed to.

MOTIONS TO RECONSIDER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further morning business the morning hour has expired, and the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. INGALLS. Before the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business I rise to a question of order. The Chair will remember that on Thursday last after a three days' debate the Senate passed a bill in relation to the rights of homestead and pre-emption settlers within the limits of railroad grants. Last evening a member of the House of Representatives called upon me to ascertain why the bill had not been forwarded for action by that body, and upon inquiring at the desk of the Secretary I was informed that a Senator had preferred a private request that the bill might be retained in order to enable him if he saw fit to enter a motion for reconsideration.

The point upon which I desire the ruling of the Chair is whether a bill can be retained after its passage by the Senate at the private request of a Senator for the purpose of making a motion for reconsideration within the two days that are allowed by the rules for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the usage of the Senate has been for the Secretary to retain a bill at the instance of any Senator, inasmuch as the rule gives the right to reconsider within two days next following the day on which it passed, unless the bill passes out of the possession of the Senate, in which case the privilege of reconsideration is lost. In order to preserve that privilege it has been the practice of the Senate uniformly, as the Chair understands, that when a Senator desires a reconsideration within the time he so expresses himself to the Secretary, and the bill has been retained. This usage has been uniform. Since the practice is now objected to by the Senator from Kansas, who raises the question by a point of order, the Chair will submit to the Senate whether hereafter the practice of the Senate shall be in conformity with prior usage, or shall it conform strictly to the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the rule bearing on the subject?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the twentieth rule.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

When a question has been made and carried in the affirmative or negative, whether previously reconsidered or not, it shall be in order for any Senator of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof; but no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after the bill, resolution, message, report, amendment, or motion upon which the vote was taken shall have gone out of the possession of the Senate, announcing their decision, except a resolution confirming or rejecting a nomination by the President; nor shall any motion for reconsideration be in order, unless made on the same day on which the vote was taken, or within the two next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter; but a motion to reconsider a vote upon a nomination shall always, if the resolution announcing the decision of the Senate has been sent to the President, be accompanied by a motion requesting the President to return the same to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire whether the bill in question has gone to the House of Representatives?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the bill has gone to the other House.

Mr. CONKLING. Then may I further inquire how it is in order in any way to present this question to the Chair, or to call upon the Chair to present it to the Senate? If the bill were still here, and the purpose was to have the action of the Chair or of the Senate take effect upon the bill and expedite it to the House, I could understand it; but the Senator rises and states, as a historical fact—a recent fact to be sure, but still a fact that is past—that under the usage of the Senate, some Senator requested that a bill should be withheld pending the lapse of that time within which he might move to reconsider that bill, if upon consideration he felt called upon to do so. That occurred; and the Secretary did what the Secretary so far as I am informed has always done; and now the Senator rising and stating that as a fact in the past, the bill having gone from the jurisdiction of the Secretary, the Chair, and the Senate, and being in the possession of the House, asks the Chair to rule upon it.

I do not know that there is any objection practically to having now, when the question has not arisen or has passed away, a decision upon it, if the Senator from Kansas feels interested in that as an abstract question which may or may not arise in the future; but I submit that it is reaching some distance after a question of order to take a thing which has already passed, and make it the occasion on which to hang such a consideration. I will not object to it if the vote of the Senate is to be taken; but if it is to lead to debate I shall feel called upon to submit to the Chair that the point of order is inopportune in point of time.

I ought to say that I made no request about the retention of the bill; I do not know what Senator did. I feel no interest in this particular case myself. I did not know, until the announcement was made, that it had been retained. But if we are to debate this question at all, I suggest that we had better wait until it arises on some bill which is still here, and which the Senator wants to send to the House, and not expend our breath on an occasion that seems to have passed by and ceased to be before the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, with very great deference to the opinion and judgment of the Senator from New York, I contend that this is a practical question, and not an abstract question, because if this interpretation of the rule or this power that is claimed by Senators upon private motion is to be sustained by a vote of the Senate, it practically at one period in the session puts the entire business of this body within the control of any individual member who may see fit to retard it. Take the case of the last two days of the session, when, as every Senator knows, a very large proportion of the legislative business is transacted. If it is to be understood that, whenever a bill passes this body, any Senator who voted with the majority is to be allowed to go privately to the Clerk's desk and say to him, "I desire that this bill may be held over a couple of days, because I propose to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which it passed," every one can see without any very great profundity of investigation that it is a matter that will practically interrupt and destroy the whole business of the Senate. Therefore, I say that it is not by any means an abstract question; it is a very practical question; and I have taken occasion to introduce it at the present time simply because when I inquired this morning, on the fifth day after the passage of this bill, I was informed by the Secretary that it had not been transmitted to the House of Representatives. I think, sir, that this is a question of great moment, of great practical consideration, and that if this latent, or hidden, or obscure power does rest with any individual Senator to delay and retard the whole progress of business, the rules had better be amended, or some action taken that will render it plain and clear in the future.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest that this matter be referred to the Committee on Rules to consider, rather than that we should consider it here now. If we should now adopt suddenly a new rule, we should reproach the Senator whoever he is—and I do not know who he is—who has exercised simply the customary right of a Senator in the transaction of business. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that no single Senator ought to have the power to restrain the ordinary and usual course of business, but that when a bill passes it should be immediately communicated to the other House. I think the language of the twentieth rule contemplates that, because it denies to the Senate the right to reconsider in case the bill has passed from it. It contemplates the probability that the bill will pass from it before the expiration of the time limited for a reconsideration. Therefore I think that the rule does not authorize this practice; but it is the practice, and many of our rules are but the usages which have grown with time. If a Senator has exercised an ordinary custom in this body, as a matter of course he ought not to be reproached by our action at this moment upon the presentation of the facts; but if the rule is faulty, or if a bad practice has grown out of the construction of the rule, it ought to be corrected; and I think the Committee on Rules might very fairly take up the case. Let the subject-matter be referred to them; and then, if it is proper to direct the Secretary at once to communicate bills on their passage, let it be so done. I can see how the Secretary would be very much embarrassed in the present state of affairs. If it has been the custom to hold bills at the demand of a single Senator to enable him to move a reconsideration, while it might delay the public business, yet I think the Secretary might very properly hesitate about violating that custom. I move therefore that the subject-matter be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. SARGENT. For that purpose I offer a resolution to bring the matter before the Committee on Rules. At the same time I do not believe it is expedient to amend the rule in the manner suggested.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state, as the Senator from New York has raised the question, that the Senator from Kansas raised a point of order, and the Chair submitted the point to the Senate in order to relieve the Secretary from embarrassment, for it is an embarrassment to him, as this matter rests on practice and not on the express rule. The Chair stated that it was irregular; that if he were called upon to decide upon the rule of the Senate, the objection of the Senator from Kansas was well taken; but it is a question of practice, and for that reason the Chair proposed to submit it to the Senate for the purpose of relieving the Secretary of the embarrassment of deciding such cases.

Mr. INGALLS. I had no intention whatever of reproaching any Senator or of casting any reflection upon any gentleman who had availed himself of this assumed privilege; but it certainly, as the Chair suggests, places the Secretary or Clerk of the Senate in a very embarrassing position after a bill has passed to permit a Senator to lodge a private request with him to hold a bill for the purpose of enabling him to make a motion to reconsider, which, as in this case, never was made.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the resolution I have offered be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules consider and report as to the expediency of so amending the rules as to require the Secretary of the Senate, on the request of one or more Senators who voted in the affirmative on any bill or joint resolution, to retain any such bill or resolution and not to transmit it to the House of Representatives until the time for a motion for reconsideration shall have passed.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer that simply that the Committee on Rules may have jurisdiction of the matter. I do not believe myself that the practice which has grown up is wholesome. I think that the spirit of the rule is that on a bill being completed by the Senate by its final vote it goes to the House of Representatives as soon as the proper record can be made by the Secretary, and that is the better way; and if a Senator desires to reconsider he must make the motion before the bill is transmitted to the House of Representatives. He probably can do it immediately, or certainly give notice of his intention. I think the Committee on Rules should consider the matter, and either make the practice thoroughly legitimate under the rules so as to relieve the Secretary of embarrassment and inform Senators of their rights, or they should pronounce against the practice and by refusing to amend the rules show that such a practice is not sanctioned by the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, I do not understand that a bill has ever been retained more than the two days within which it is in the power of any Senator to retain it by entering a motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think it is quite well to refer this matter to the Committee on Rules, but certainly there are occasions when it is quite as well that a bill should remain over one day. Sometimes bills are passed at the close of a day's session by a very few votes when many Senators are absent; and I think a rule that would require the Secretary—I do not know but that the rule requires it now—but the rigid enforcement of a rule that would require the Secretary, immediately upon the passage of a bill, to transmit it to the other House, might lead to some inconveniences at times, although I believe the Senate generally, at the request of a Senator who desires to enter a motion to reconsider, asks for the return of the bill from the House of Representatives. He has a right to enter the motion, but it takes no effect unless the bill be here. We all must know that the less our proceedings are confined within rigid rules, and the more they are modified and regulated by that comity and good feeling that have always distinguished the body, the better it is for us, although of course there must be some limits to that, there must be limits within which the rules cannot be permitted to be transcended.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection, as the Senator from Rhode Island says he has none, to this subject going to the Committee on Rules. Before it goes, however, I wish to make two remarks to correct what seems to me to be a misapprehension on the part of the Senator from Kansas, and, possibly, other Senators. In the first place, it must be observed that, if by a rule an allowance of two days is made, as the time within which a motion to reconsider may be made, and if the bill is to be hastened away at once from the jurisdiction of the body and no provision made against that, the right to reconsider is a mere nominal right, unless it can be supposed that some Senator opposed to the bill would change his vote and vote with the majority in order that he might continue his opposition, or, on the other hand, that some Senator, who conscientiously has voted for the bill, will change his mind in the twinkling of an eye or upon a request and enter a motion to reconsider. Neither of those things is to be supposed; neither of them, I think, would be wholesome. Therefore, the rule fixing a time contemplates upon its face that within that time the bill may, even though it must not necessarily, remain within the jurisdiction of the body.

The Senator from Kansas reminds us that at the end of a session a single member would have control and command of the business of the body, because he might make such a request. My chief purpose at this moment is to correct, if I can, that impression. I deny utterly that any such thing could flow from this rule. A bill has been acted upon by the Senate affirmatively. Somebody has charge of that bill. We are, in the supposed case, within twelve hours of the end of a session. If it were to be neglected by everybody and some request made to hold it, what the Senator suggests might occur. Practically it never would occur; and for this reason: a bill failing to go to the House and that coming to the knowledge of the Senator having it in charge, he inquires why; the Secretary says that the Senator from Kansas, or some other Senator, has made a request that it be withheld so that a motion to reconsider may be entered. The Senator having charge of the bill inquires whether that motion is to be made. Ascertaining that it may be made but is withheld and a postponement going on, it is his right, or the right of any Senator who favored the bill, immediately to make a motion to reconsider and ask the Senate to vote upon that motion, and that puts an end to the whole thing. That we have seen done.

I remember when the bill distributing the Alabama award was acted upon in the Senate, a Senator not now in his seat moved to reconsider the vote and asked that it might stand over, the Senate being thin, and that the vote might be taken the next day; but upon the demand of another Senator the Senate proceeded to vote upon the motion to reconsider, and that forever expended the power of the Senate under the rules to reconsider. So I say to the Senator from Kansas that although a power may exist to lodge, as he says, a private request with the Secretary, whenever that occurs at a time likely to be detrimental to the interest of legislation or to procrastinate dangerously, any Senator may insist that the motion shall be made at once, or may make it himself if he voted with the majority and bring the Senate to a vote upon it.

It may be said that some factious member of the body even then might proceed to debate and to protract proceedings. Yes; we have no previous question; any factious member might continue to debate any question as long as his perversity or his power lasted; but we do not make rules in this body upon the theory that such things occur, because they do not occur; and therefore I wish for one to say, before this matter goes to the Committee on Rules, that I see no danger in the possibilities pointed out by the Senator from Kansas; although, as I repeat, neither in this case nor in any other case that I remember have I ever had occasion to request the Secretary to withhold a bill. But the present rule and the practice has worked without detriment as far as I know so far, never having led to anything more than a complaint that there had been a little hasty practice in bringing the Senate to a vote on a motion to reconsider, when it would have been agreeable to some Senator to have it stand over to another day. That is the worst contingency I have ever known to occur out of the rule as it stands. so far.

Mr. HARVEY. Mr. President, the remarks of the Senator from New York render it necessary for me to make a statement in regard to this matter. It so happens that I had charge of the bill which has been referred to while it was under consideration before the Senate. Under the impression that the bill had been sent to the House, I informed certain members of the House from my own State and others with whom I happened to be acquainted, and who I knew felt an interest in the bill, that the bill had passed this body and, I supposed, had gone to the House. One of the members under that impression made a motion in the House, I believe, to refer it to the Committee on Public Lands there. Finding that the bill had not yet been presented there, he came to the Senate Chamber and called my attention to the fact. I went to the Secretary and ascertained that the bill had not been sent for the reason which has been stated, that a Senator had requested that it be withheld so that he might, if he deemed it proper, move a reconsideration. I informed my colleague of that fact, and that it would be necessary for us to be present, the friends of the bill to be present, and vote whether such a motion was made before the adjournment last evening; and that if such motion was not then made, I was informed by the Secretary the bill would be sent to the House upon its meeting to-day.

This being the situation, I should have made no remarks on the subject now but for the fact that the honorable Senator from New York in what he said alluded to the circumstance that every bill upon its passage here was supposed to be under the charge of some Senator representing the committee to which the bill had been referred.

I deem it proper, in justice to myself, to make this statement in answer to the remarks made by the Senator from New York.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, it will be seen on reference to our rule that, in regard to nominations, it was found advisable not to have the final action of the Senate on nominations sent to the President until the end of the two days, within which any Senator may move a reconsideration. That is now the rule in regard to nominations, so that the practice in legislative business only conforms to the rule in regard to executive business, and the rule in regard to executive business was made on account of the convenience of the Senators and to afford facilities for an examination of proceedings that had taken place often in a thin Senate. The practice in legislative proceedings conforms to the positive rule in regard to executive proceedings, although strictly the rule in regard to legislative proceedings is undoubtedly the other way. As the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] suggests, the rule, which is a recent one in executive proceedings, merely makes the executive proceedings conform to the practice, which was not in violation of the rule but rather a loose construction of the rule in regard to legislative proceedings.

Mr. INGALLS. Does the Senator think that any member of this body ought to have the power, after a question has been acted on by the body, privately, without notifying any person of his intention, to apply to the Secretary to have a bill or a nomination held over in order to enable him to deliberate whether he wants to make a motion to reconsider or not, and thereby thwart the expressed will of the majority of the body?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is a question that I would rather answer after the matter has been investigated by the Committee on Rules. It is the practice now, and always has been the practice.

Mr. MORTON. Let me suggest one question to the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from New York says there is no danger in this rule at the close of the session, because somebody will be in charge of the bill and will find out that the bill has been held back, and can, therefore, require the motion to reconsider to be made at once. Now I want to submit whether it is the duty of members who are interested in bills at the close of the session to keep watch by going to the Clerk and inquiring whether bills have been sent to the other House or not, and, if they find that they have not, to come into the Senate and be compelled to make a motion to reconsider themselves when they do not want any reconsideration, in order to have the subject disposed of in time to get it to the other House that it may be passed upon there. It seems to me that that illustration points to the danger of the rule.

Mr. INGALLS. Not the rule, the custom.

Mr. MORTON. The custom, I should say. If I am interested in the passage of a bill toward the close of the session and I want it to go to the other House soon, am I bound to keep watch at the Clerk's desk, and if I find some Senator has requested a delay, then to come into the Senate and call upon him to make his motion at once, or if he does not do it to make it myself and get action on it so as to have the bill go over to the House? It seems to me that whenever a bill passes this body the friends of it have a right to take it for granted that it goes to the other House at once, and not be obliged to keep private watch at the Clerk's desk to know whether a request has been lodged there to keep the bill back.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, if I understand the rule there need be no very particular difficulty about this matter. Suppose in this very case that a Senator who had voted in the majority, wanting to cut off the opportunity for a motion to reconsider, had moved forthwith on the passage of the bill to reconsider, and then to lay that motion on the table, that cuts its off; and the same vote that passes the bill would put the motion to reconsider on the table; and that is the common practice, I understand.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is the common practice in the other House; but under our rules a motion to lay on the table would not end the matter; it would simply leave it on the table, to be taken up at any moment. The rule of the Senate is exactly opposite to the rule of the House in that respect. A motion to lay on the table a motion to reconsider is the end in the House, but in the Senate a motion to lay on the table does not have that effect. It only puts it where it can be taken up.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why not take it up and consider it forthwith? Suppose in this very case a Senator who has voted in the majority moves to reconsider and moves further to have that motion considered at once? I do not remember any clause of any rule of the Senate that prohibits that.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, there are two or three considerations in relation to this subject which I think are worthy of the attention of the Senate.

In the first place, all the rules of this body are made for two purposes: First, to facilitate business; and, second, to protect minorities in this body. The rule to which reference has been made has given to the minority the right to have two days in which to enter a motion to reconsider. That rule has always been in existence and never been known to work injuriously. I think if there were a positive rule requiring that it should be retained at least twenty-four hours, saving the last day of the session, it would be a wise rule, because we very frequently have to send for the return of bills that have gone to the House, where we have discovered our own errors and wished to correct them; and those errors might have been corrected here in twenty-four hours, or in forty-eight, if the bill were retained here that length of time.

But I want to say one word for the Senator who made the request of the Secretary, one word in relation to the uniform practice of this body. I do not know who the Senator is, but I am here to say that he has done just what was right, nothing more, nothing less. One expression has been used which I do not like: "Going privately to the Secretary." There is nothing private about it. If I had had any wish to enter a motion to reconsider, or if it had been a matter of doubt with me and I might arrive at the conclusion that I would wish to enter that motion, I should have gone to the Secretary and said, "Sir, I think I may," or "Perhaps I may deem it advisable to move a reconsideration of this vote; retain the bill in the Senate, that I may have the right given to me by the rule of the Senate." It has been uniform. It has been done thousands of times, and this is the first time I ever heard a suggestion of wrong or impropriety in relation to it. It is for the purpose of giving the minority what they deem a right; majorities can take care of themselves.

Mr. INGALLS. Why, Mr. President, the right to reconsider does not rest with the minority; it rests with the majority.

Mr. HAMLIN. The right with the minority or the right with any Senator, if he be in a position to make that motion, exists, and then it is a question for the Senate to determine what they will do upon that motion. Now, the objection which the Senator from Kansas makes is that during the last two days of a session some Senator may improperly avail himself of that construction of the rule and thereby do wrong.

Mr. INGALLS. No; I said that would be the practical effect. I did not impute any wrong motive or improper purpose to anybody. I simply said that the practical effect might be that legislation might be thwarted and destroyed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well. Now, when my friend turns his attention to other rules he will find that, if we are going to so change them as to obviate that objection, we must go to a very large extent into our rules. Every Senator knows that in the last few days and in the last few hours of our session the principal appropriation bills and other important bills are put upon their passage; and what says your rule? You cannot read a bill the first and second times on the same day, and you cannot suspend that rule without unanimous consent.

Mr. INGALLS. The rules always are suspended at the close of the session.

Mr. HAMLIN. They always are suspended, and so will the proper course be taken if you leave the rules as they are in this respect.

Mr. INGALLS. We are not complaining of the rules in this case, if the Senator pleases, but of this private prescription or habit that has grown up under the rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is no private prescription about it; there comes the word "private" again. I go to the Secretary and say, "Sir, I wish you to retain that bill, because I may want to make a motion to reconsider." The Senator from Kansas is interested in the bill, and he inquires, "Have you sent that bill to the House?" "No, sir." "Why not?" "Mr. HAMLIN has requested me to retain it, so that he may exercise the right he has according to the rule." There is nothing private about it.

Mr. INGALLS. There is nothing public about it.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is true that he does not give notice here; he does not make the motion, but he gives notice to the Secretary, and he may make that motion or he may not, as he pleases. The evil that may arise I think is not to be apprehended in any way, because no Senator——

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to suggest to the Senator that the proper way is for the Senator to make his motion to reconsider, and then it can lie over for two days, and he may withdraw it if he sees fit. The case which he refers to of the suspension of the rules is in open Senate; every Senator is present and can object.

Mr. HAMLIN. Very well; but suppose a bill has passed to-day and I am a friend of that bill and I discover what I think is a material error in that bill. As a friend and one of the majority, I do not discover it until after the Senate has adjourned to-day. Where is the impropriety in the remotest degree in my asking the Secretary not to send that bill over to the House?

Again, it has been suggested that we adopt the rule of the House in regard to reconsideration. I hope not. Senators will be unwise if they do so. I have thought—indeed I believe I have favored a limited previous question in this body. Being very nearly a non-talking man, I have sometimes got wearied of the wisdom I have heard from those around me, and I have thought that as the body increased in numbers we should be compelled to adopt a limited previous question. I will do it long before I will do what they have been compelled from their large number in the House to do, pass a bill and to prevent further action on it uniformly on all measures rise and move a reconsideration and to lay that motion to reconsider on the table. I hope that practice never will obtain here; but suppose it did, it would be inoperative here as it is in the House. What is the result in the House? When a motion is made to lay on the table it can be taken up only when it is reached in its order of business, and that time never in the life of man or at least in the life of the session arrives there. Consequently when a motion to reconsider in the House is laid on the table, that is equivalent to a refusal to reconsider. How would it be in the Senate? Any one can move to proceed to the consideration of that motion on the table at any time, and take it up by a simple vote of a majority. Consequently you would not avoid the difficulty in that way.

Sir, this rule is old, and I honor it for its age; it has never done any wrong; and I warn Senators that if we attempt to change it minorities will be the first to feel the improper action.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriation for the Military Academy at West Point for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877; and

A bill (H. R. No. 26) to remove the political disabilities of Francis T. Nichols, of Louisiana.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. SARGENT to the amendment of Mr. ALLISON.

The amendment of Mr. ALLISON was to insert as a proviso:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

The amendment of Mr. SARGENT was to add thereto the following:

And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, two years ago the country was startled to learn that, under the authority or pretended authority of an act of Congress, a debt had been created within three years in this District of upward of $20,000,000 for the improvement of the streets; and the apprehension and alarm which such an announcement caused was rather intensified at the opening of the present session and by the disclosures of the debate which we have had in this body for the last two or three days to learn that instead of this monstrous expenditure of public money having been checked by Congress when their attention had been fully called to it, the tide of reckless extravagance has not only not diminished, but seems rather to have gathered force, and that in a community of some 120,000 souls, $5,000,000 and upward have been expended in the past year and as much or more is estimated for expenditure next year in extending, paving, resettling grades, and so on, of streets and avenues, that being the identical character of work in which a debt equal almost to a national debt had been incurred within the three years from 1871 to 1874.

Mr. President, the Constitution has given Congress the power of exclusive legislation in all cases over this territory ceded to it for the purpose of a seat of Government, and with the power comes the responsibility; and how can we stand before the people of this country to explain and justify the monstrous acts of misgovernment, waste, and maladministration which a debt of such magnitude incurred within so short a period—and for such purposes—necessarily implies? For my own part I will say that it shall only be, it has been in the past, against my protest and best endeavors that such a result has been made possible.

This District is an anomaly under our system, for while it is true that Congress has the exclusive jurisdiction over it, it does not follow, as seemed to be implied by the honorable Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] yesterday, that exclusive jurisdiction meant unlimited power. That the people of this community should be handed over to the mere caprice and despotic control of Congress, was certainly not intended; and although there is by no express proviso the duty imposed on Congress of maintaining a republican form of government in the District, the provision on that subject being confined to the States to each of whom the United States are to guarantee a republican form of government, yet there is, by implication, the idea everywhere prevailing that in every community of American citizens a representative republican form of government properly should exist.

The District of Columbia contains about one hundred and thirty thousand people, two-thirds of whom are white and one-third of whom are negroes or colored people of different shades. I do not suppose that in any community in this country there is so little productive industry. I do not suppose in any community of like size there exists so purely a consuming population as there is here. The blacks, of course, have but little property. Their general occupation is that of domestic servants, and the like, caterers and waiters upon those who visit this metropolis upon pleasure or business. The whites consist largely of wayfarers, clerks who, under our unfortunate system of civil service, remain here but for a few years until the same tide of political opinion that swept them in shall turn and sweep them out, and so of us, who come here for one or more terms in either House of Congress; so that there is a floating population greater in proportion than in any other community in the country, a non-producing population, with none of the attributes or occupations which produce property or wealth. The last census, as I remember, disclosed the fact that there were but six hundred persons engaged in agriculture in this District. There is virtually no production here at all; and yet having such a population, producing nothing and consuming only, that a debt so grossly disproportionate to their means of payment has been allowed to be created by the agency of Congress—for it is but just to say that the voice and protests of the property-holders and tax-payers of the District have been little heard or heeded in the matter. They have not been permitted to choose their own rulers; and those who have been set in power over them since the close of the war have not been those whom either the property or intelligence or character of the community approved or trusted. The choice has been that of the President of the United States, and his action has been confirmed by the Senate, without regard to the wishes or opinions of the better citizens of the District.

Now, sir, another anomaly in this city is that its chief use is by strangers; it is not a city of homes; it is a city of hotels and lodging-houses; and I do not believe 2 per cent. of those who ride in carriages through these luxurious streets which have been provided at such enormous cost are residents or citizens of the District; and almost all the luxury and convenience which this vast expenditure has created is for the benefit of travelers and strangers from all parts of the country; and the people of Washington have very little more than a local and incidental advantage of these things created chiefly for the benefit, the pleasure, and the luxury of strangers. Therefore to suppose that they are to bear the whole expense of improvements of this kind would be utterly unreasonable. It would not be right that you and I, sir, who spend here half the year and are not personally taxed here, who neither have our homes nor our interests here except for a very limited period of the year, a mere temporary habitation, should have the benefit and use of and compel the local population to keep in repair these streets for our accommodation, and throw the entire cost on them. The city of Washington is a Federal city, belonging to and used by the people of all the States of the Union, and the people of the whole country therefore, necessarily in reason and in justice, will bear, and ought to bear, the chief part of the cost of maintaining the streets and highways of this town in proper and respectable condition. I do not believe the people of this country will at all object to that. I think, on the contrary, a sense of what was proper and right would make them very willing that proper and reasonable expenditures should be made to maintain this town in what you may call appropriate condition for the needs, the comfort, the convenience of our Government and those who are compelled by business to come here.

If any other view be taken, the case of the citizens of this District would be hopeless. This District was absolutely insolvent and bankrupt, and property in it was absolutely worthless if such a debt as Shepherd and his confederates piled up on it between 1871 and 1874 had been permitted to rest upon the shoulders of the resident property-holders alone. It was absolutely worthless. You could not have put up the private property in the town and sold it for enough to pay such debt. It could not bear it, because the interest upon the debt and the expense of the government outweighed all that the property could produce. The Congress of the United States recognized that fact, and with it the duty of the Government to participate to a very large proportion in this expense. They recognized it by their appropriations. They directly recognized by the language of the act creating this last board of commissioners, in which they declare that the interest upon certain bonds authorized by them should have the faith of the United States pledged to pay the interest by proper proportional appropriations contemplated by the act, together with taxes to be levied from the local revenues. What that "proper proposition" was to be is not very clear; but it will certainly startle the people of the United States to know that, while we have had from the Treasury statements of the reduction of the public debt, we have also had in the shape of obligations of the Government for the payment of the principal and interest of the debt of the District such an enormous increase as $5,000,000 in a single year, and that the United States is bound, according to the opinion of the Attorney-General, not only for the debt so funded under this law, but that, as the law now stands, bound for any debt which these commissioners shall in their own will and pleasure certify to be due from the United States and order bonds to be issued for, in discharge of the cost of any embellishment and improvement of the city they may see fit to enter upon.

Well, Mr. President, if this be the state of affairs, the sooner it is arrested the better. I consider it arrested from to-day, because this debate and the action of both Houses of Congress will give notice that the power of the agents is questioned, and that the principal will hold those who now deal with those agents to a strict account as to whether they have surpassed the proper scope of their agency and whether they acted recklessly or in bad faith as the sequel shall demonstrate, and until it does I shall express no opinion whether these bonds ought or ought not to be met by payments from the Treasury of the United States.

During the war Washington was a military depot. Every one can recall what a camp it was, how long trains of wagons laden with Army stores, how whole parks of artillery rattled through the streets in all seasons, plowing them up and reducing them to an almost impassable condition. It was bad enough before; it was far worse in those years in which the presence of military armaments was made necessary; and there is no doubt that a great deal had to be done, and that, as the damage had been caused by the action of the Government of the United States, the same power that caused it should apply the remedy at its own cost. That seems to me perfectly reasonable and proper.

When the war ended there was a still sadder and stranger condition of affairs. The emancipation of the blacks in Virginia, in Maryland, and in other States of the South had driven into this community a vast number of the most poverty-stricken people upon whom the sun ever shone. They swarmed in here, refusing to perform agricultural labor, with but little work of other character given to them, and they were invested with the privilege of suffrage; they exercised it, and how they exercised it we all know. It is part of the history of our time. They exercised it necessarily as weak and ignorant people always will exercise a power of the duties of which they have no conception and of the objects of which they have very little consciousness at all. The result was that they became the easy and natural prey of the lowest and most profligate politicians, and a class of men were placed in political power in this District who had the respect and confidence of no one—not of the party in whose name they were elected, and who for party reasons desired their election; but it was the triumph in this District of vice, ignorance, incapacity, and sloth over all that was intelligent, honest, and self-sustaining.

What did Congress do? I admit a remedy was absolutely necessary, and in February, 1871, so bad was the state of things, so insecure had property become and flagrant the abuses of the local government, that an act repealing and wiping out all power of suffrage and all form of republican government within this District was passed by the Congress of the United States. Under this act a board of public works was created, a governor of the District, a secretary to aid the governor, and divers other officials who were simply satellites, who played around his person and did his bidding. This board, created in 1871 by the act of February 21 of that year, was composed of persons nominated by the President of the United States—first of the governor, Cooke, of A. R. Shepherd, of J. A. Magruder, of A. B. Mullett, and of S. P. Brown. Mr. Shepherd was made vice-president and the treasurer was Mr. Magruder. The governor ex officio was president of this board. Soon after, owing to the financial troubles of his house, Mr. Cooke was displaced and Mr. Shepherd was immediately appointed by the President; but it is a fact, disclosed since by the testimony taken before joint committees of the two Houses, that Shepherd was from the first the ruling spirit. Call the government what you will or what its form was, it was in truth and fact the government of Shepherd by Shepherd, and largely for Shepherd; nothing more and nothing less.

What were the results of thus committing the government of this District to his hands? A joint select committee reported on the 16th of June, 1874, in very restrained language—some persons might think it mealy-mouthed—such facts of gross maladministration upon the part of this board of public works, such clear violation of law, such a monstrous and corrupt system of expenditure, that this committee composed of gentlemen of both parties in the two Houses unanimously recommended the immediate removal of the entire gang from office and power. It is scarcely necessary for me to read the language of the committee, to be found on pages 8 and 9 of the report.

There was an application made by Mr. Shepherd's board for authority to spend $6,000,000 upon a "comprehensive system" of public improvements. Congress refused it, but authorized the expenditure of $4,000,000 and the issue of bonds to that amount. Upon that authority he spent $18,000,000, besides the revenue he derived from the District in the shape of taxation and by raising money by hypothecation in every shape and by every contrivance, which since that time has been recognized by those who have succeeded him and has taken the shape of a funded debt on which the people of the United States are expected to pay the interest and principal at maturity. But this committee, composed of a large majority of those who dealt so very gingerly with this subject and who spoke so very restrainedly of operations to which I shall refer, yet used language of this kind:

Taking into consideration the expense involved in the comprehensive plan before referred to, and enlarged as stated, your committee are of opinion that the board adopted an erroneous and in its results a vicious method of letting contracts for this work, namely, without competition open to the public; and that the method adopted by the board resulted in the payment of an increased price over and above what would have been paid if open, fair, and free competition had been invited.

After the passage of the loan act of $4,000,000, the board of public works invited proposals and bids for work to be done in pursuance of said plan, and on the 1st of September opened all these various bids, giving notice afterward to the bidders that none of the bids would be accepted, but that the board would fix a scale of prices for the various classes of work, and let contracts, at their discretion, upon this scale of fixed prices. This opened the way for favoritism in the letting of contracts, and for a system of brokerage in contracts which was demoralizing in its results, bringing into the list of contractors a class of people unaccustomed to perform the work required, and enabling legitimate contractors to pay large prices in order to secure contracts, and, in the opinion of your committee, was the beginning of nearly all the irregularities disclosed in the testimony in the letting of contracts. Any system which would enable an adventurer to come from a distant city and in the name of a contracting firm make proffers of fifty cents per yard to any person having, or supposed to have, influence with the board, whereby a paving contract could be secured, and after persistent effort succeed in securing a contract, and actually binding his principals, the contractors, to pay $97,000 for a contract of 200,000 yards of pavement, after an effort of five months to secure it, the gross amount to be received being only about $700,000, in its nature must be vicious and ought to be condemned.

Well, sir, one would think that such a transaction as that could be properly characterized in much simpler and more forcible terms. The truth was, that, according to the testimony taken from witnesses under oath by this committee, these contracts were jobbed out without the least reference to responsibility or capacity of the person to perform them, and that the granting of a contract was the gift of a large sum of money as a gratuity to the man who got it. There is one case of a clergyman who for doing nothing in regard to a contract was enabled to make some ten or fifteen thousand dollars. Here is a man who makes $97,000 on a contract where the whole amount involved was $700,000, and he, as the report states, an adventurer from a distant city, to whom is handed $97,000 profit without an hour of labor or a penny of responsibility. God only knows how much the people who had the contract made out of it. And the profit to the "rings," whose real estate was improved and developed by this "comprehensive system," was of course enormous. From page 11 of this report we may imagine what must have been the condition of affairs:

Notwithstanding the powers of the auditor and of the treasurer, the board, during the three years it has been in existence, has done nothing in the way of verifying the accounts of these two officers. This is a negligence not to be excused in those in whom such important trusts were confided.

At page 14 of the same report we find:

The board of public works since September 1, 1871—

A period of two and a half years—have expended and contracted to expend over $20,000,000 in the improvement of streets, avenues, and roadways, and in the construction of sewers, and in the general ornamentation and embellishment of the city. This is equal to about $7,000,000 per annum.

No public buildings to be erected and paid for, no reference here to the vast sums appropriated by Congress for the support of this District, a partial list of which I have here. I find that from April, 1871, to February, 1875, a year ago, there were $3,521,000 appropriated by Congress to the expenses of this District. I do not find that any of these expenditures related to public buildings, but they were all for what may be called the municipal expenses of Washington.

The committee, after finding that this fearful sum of money had been spent in this community of one hundred and twenty thousand souls, and after commenting upon the heavy burdens it would lay on these people and the people of the United States, solaced themselves, however, by saying that these parks and wide avenues and streets, upon which this money had been so poured in a lavish flood, "although expensive to inaugurate, will easily be kept in repair and make the burden of expensive carriage-ways in the future comparatively light." This was the beautiful picture that, although the debt had been so frightful and the expenditures so undue, yet at least permanence had been secured and these luxurious carriage-ways would continue to be kept in repair easily at a "comparatively light" expense.

Well, sir, the fact of this maladministration, of this gross and profligate expenditure, had been brought before Congress time and again by the tax-paying citizens of this District. Their cries fell upon dull ears; but at last the facts, thanks to the investigating spirit of the public press exterior to the District, became too strong and public opinion at last compelled a hearing of the complaints. The tax-payers of this District were not acting for themselves alone. They were acting in behalf of every man in this country who earns his daily bread by his labor. They acted on behalf of the tax-payers of the United States. They came before Congress, asking no appropriation to aid them in ferreting out these abuses. They at their private expense employed intelligent and able counsel, and they brought such a case before that committee that they were unable to resist it; and the result was that this board of public works was to be swept out of official existence into the ignominy which it deserved. There was strenuous resistance to the investigation. Counsel were employed by Mr. Shepherd and his associates to brow-beat the witnesses, to conduct fierce, rigid, and recriminating cross-examinations. Prosecutions were threatened, indictments were found, and, sir, not only that, but a resort to crime not fit to be mentioned in our own day and time. Never in the history of this country, never in the century in which we live, was such a crime proposed for the purpose of stifling investigation as was attempted and set on foot in this District, but under God's good providence defeated. I mean the assault upon the character of Columbus Alexander, a citizen of high character and standing, by pretending that a gross crime and felony had been committed, which never had been committed; to cause the appearance of crime by this man to be charged upon him as a dreadful reality. The facts of that are all before us. Some of the persons inculpated have undergone the forms of trial in this District before what they are pleased to term a jury of impartial men, who did not agree upon a verdict; but the facts attending the trial have disclosed the hideous nature of the proposed assault upon Mr. Alexander—a crime reminding one of those eras in history called "the dark ages." I do not think there is a man who loves justice, who cares for good name or character, throughout this broad land whose blood must not have curdled in his veins when he read how nearly a perfectly innocent, honorable gentleman came to being called upon to defend himself against an odious and dreadful charge, a fictitious felony invented to blast the good name of an innocent man, a private citizen whose sole offense had been that he had petitioned the Government of his country for relief against fraudulent and excessive expenditures, involving taxation upon him and his property.

Well, sir, the investigation was had; the blow at Alexander was thwarted; it recoiled upon those who originated it, and that curse, like chickens, came home to roost. I trust yet that the full truth in regard to that nefarious conspiracy may become known, and that the guilty authors and all those who combined to shelter them from justice may be brought to the punishment and public reprehension they so richly deserve.

But the report of the joint committee was made after patient investigation. They bestowed some three or four months' of careful labor upon it, and the result in substance completely justified everything that the petitioning tax-payers of the District had charged. So strong was the testimony that a bill was reported unanimously and passed this body almost without opposition abolishing the board of public works and putting, so to speak, this District into bankruptcy, that three trustees, commissioners, assignees, call them what you will, were to gather up the raveled assets of these people and learn in some way where they stood. The law that appointed these three commissioners, in its very first clause, answered the petition of these tax-payers and confirmed all that they had charged:

That all provisions of law providing for an executive, for a secretary for the District, for a Legislative Assembly, for a board of public works, and for a Delegate in Congress in the District of Columbia are hereby repealed: Provided, That this repeal shall not affect the term of office of the present Delegate in Congress.

Then section 2:

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, who shall, until otherwise provided by law, exercise all the power and authority now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, except as hereinafter limited, and shall be subject to all the restrictions and limitations now imposed by law on said governor or board, and shall have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, "to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and to the payment of the debts of said District secured by a pledge of the securities of said District or board of public works as collateral, and also to the payment of debts due to laborers" and employés of the District and board of public works; and for that purpose shall take possession and supervision of all the offices, books, papers, records, moneys, credits, securities, assets, and accounts belonging or appertaining to the business or interests of the government of the District of Columbia and the board of public works, and exercise the power and authority aforesaid; "but said commission in the exercise of such power or authority shall make no contract nor incur any obligation other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District, to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts, and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing or commenced and not completed at the time of the passage of this act."

There is, as I say, an assignment of the residue of powers uncompleted in this board of public works, coupled with the express provision that no power to make any new obligation or contract should be given to these commissioners. What was the object of the law? It was to wind up this system of lavish and reckless expenditure. It was to put an end to a state of things which had alarmed the whole country and brought shame and disgrace upon the very name of American government. Was it to continue the board of public works under the name of a commission? Why, sir, on the contrary, the act was meant as a repealing act completely of the state of things which were made possible under any construction of the law of 1871.

It authorized also the appointment to act in conjunction with them of a board of audit composed of the First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury of the United States, and there was the appointment of commissioners of a sinking fund to cause to be issued upon the certificates of these commissioners and of this board of audit bonds of the District of Columbia, guaranteed by the Government of the United States bearing a rate of interest of 3.65 per cent. per annum. I need not say now that when this act referred first to the powers invested in the board of public works by the act of 1871, (and I may as well refer to that now,) which powers, and which powers only, the commission were authorized to carry out only in respect to existing contracts, and not to any to be made in the future. The act of 1871 provides, (I read from the Revised Statutes:)

SEC. 80. All contracts made by the board of public works shall be in writing, and shall be signed by the parties making the same, and a copy thereof shall be filed in the office of the secretary of the District.

SEC. 81. The board of public works have no power to make contracts to bind said District to the payment of any sums of money except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriations shall have been made.

Again—

The board of public works are prohibited from incurring or contracting further liabilities on behalf of the United States in the improvement of streets, avenues, and reservations beyond the amount of appropriations previously made by Congress, and from entering into any contract touching such improvements on behalf of the United States, except in pursuance of appropriations made by Congress.

Here will be found a limitation upon the powers of the board of public works, which attached to the powers conferred upon the three commissioners, with the additional restriction upon the commissioners that they should not exercise even those powers upon any contracts other than those then existing. Now what has been the action under that law? In the first place, three gentlemen were appointed by the President who were all strangers to this District. When I say they were strangers, I mean to say they were all non-residents of the District. It was not that the District of Columbia did not contain men of intelligence and of character who would have had not only the benefit of their local experience and information, but also an enlightened self-interest growing out of their property at stake here. This District, as the whole country knows, contains citizens who are the peers in all respects—integrity, intelligence, ability—of any in the United States. They were not, however, men pleasing to the President of the United States, nor sympathetic to his tastes. They were not men like Mr. Shepherd, who strangely seems to have possessed and still to retain the confidence of the President. Such men were all passed by. That was a question of the proper performance of discretionary duty, which I think it is perfectly just and proper to criticise. But he brought in from Saint Louis, from New York, and, I think, from Ohio, three gentlemen, with but one of whom I have even a personal acquaintance, and in regard to whom I have nothing whatever to say, because they must stand or fall as to credit or discredit by the results of an investigation of their proceedings. Certain it is that they have disappointed me in what I had heard of them; I believe they have disappointed the country; I believe they have disappointed the Senate, and that the economy and restriction of expenditure which they were expected to practice and the reforms they were expected to inaugurate have as yet borne no good fruit. The truth is that every man in the District of Columbia with whom I have had any intercourse on this subject tells me that Shepherd's removal from office has been only nominal, that the whole personnel, the entire machinery of clerks and officials under him, through whom and by whom his will was performed in the District, have been almost without exception retained in office; that his influence over them has remained about the same, and that efforts to displace them and replace them by other persons have been entirely unsuccessful. Certain it is that if you run your eye over the list of contractors to whom contracts have been given or extended, the same class of names that awakened the suspicions and anxiety of these tax-payers will be found all the way through. The men whose profits were proved to have been most exorbitant seem to have continued their profitable careers. I know not from what motive; I am not disposed to impute motive; but I speak as to a fact that the reforms were in name only, and the change in the law of June, 1874, was one of name only, and that the same character of government which prevailed under Shepherd seems to have continued by the machinery which he left behind him and over which his control has not ceased.

Now, sir, what have these commissioners done? I will admit that they had a very difficult state of things to deal with. They found a community absolutely insolvent, a set of accounts which had been apparently purposely confused; and their task was undoubtedly very difficult. But let us take their own account of what they have done. Taking their account of the present year, they admit, on page 1 of their report of December, 1875, that the revenues which have reached their hands amount to $3,041,479.08; and they state at page 254, in the table giving a summary statement of work from the 30th of November, 1874, to the 30th of November, 1875, payable in 3.65 bonds, a total expenditure of $4,235,841.96; and add an estimate for finishing that work, $419,000 more, making a total of $4,654,897.

This report of the commissioners is voluminous; it is not indexed; but an intelligent citizen of this town has handed me a digest which he made out, page by page, of the estimates of the District commissioners, scattered through their report, for supporting the government for the next year, from July, 1876, to June, 1877; so that we may look forward, and the people of this country may look forward, if the present powers of these commissioners be continued, to the fact that this system of interest paying and bond issuing will be continued at the cost of the Treasury of the United States. I will incorporate this paper in my remarks, as I do not care to fatigue the Senate by reading it. It will be open to criticism in that way. I will only say that I have myself examined the pages and I have examined the figures of this schedule, and I find them to be sustained entirely by the report of the commissioners referred to upon the pages of this schedule.

Mr. SARGENT. We ought to vote on the bill to-day; and why not give us some idea of those figures now?

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator desires it, and I will therefore read the paper:

Pages 34, 35.	Interest on old funded debt		$518,360 88
	Salaries and expenses of sinking fund		8,200 00
	Interest on $15,000,000 of 3 65 bonds		547,500 00
195.	District portion of Metropolitan police, (one-third of whole cost)		120,400 00
196.	Charities, as per last year		34,118 00
427.	Support of schools		386,500 00
436.	Fire department		108,433 00
	Proposed addition to present force of fire department		63,075 00
449.	Washington Asylum		47,100 00
459.	Board of health		61,175 00
192.	Salaries besides school teachers, fire department, engineer department, water department, sinking fund, board of health, police and asylum as per last year		$113,341 45
255.	Estimates for engineer department		1,516,017 05
256.	Estimates for water department in excess of receipts		1,195,684 13
323, 324.	Estimates for new buildings and repairs for ensuing year:
	Schools	$324,250 00
	Markets	202,900 00
	Station-houses	72,600 00
	Hay-scales	210 00
	Engine-houses	25,000 00
	District offices and police court	195,000 00
		819,960 00
	Deduct proceeds from District buildings recommended for sale	65,700 00
			754,260 00
4.	Support of inmates of Reform School as last year		14,000 00
197.	Advertising as per last year		65,174 00
	Total expenditures as per estimates		5,553,338 51
	The present resources, taken from the last fiscal year, are:
	Taxes on $92,000,000 of assessed property, at $1.50	$1,380,000 00
	Revenue from licenses	175,000 00
	To be contributed from the District		1,555,000 00
	Leaving the people of this country to foot a bill of		3,998,338 51

Revenue from water rents is deducted from estimated expenses for water department.

That must be appropriated by Congress to keep up this District government according to the statement of the commissioners. This is of course in addition to another list included in the regular Book of Estimates transmitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for the expenses of the Metropolitan police and salaries and improvement of public grounds.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator——

Mr. BAYARD. If there is any point that the Senator wishes to correct, I will allow him to do it.

Mr. SARGENT. I only wish to call attention to the fact——

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. I merely call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the statement which he reads of probable expenses of the District is simply the estimates put in by subordinate officers in many cases. For instance, the $1,250,000 is an estimate put in by Hoxie, engineer, for improvements which may or may not be made improvements which he suggests. It is very well known that the Book of Estimates submitted to Congress for the expenses of the Government contain millions more than the appropriations made and more than the actual expenses.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from California will find that I shall go much further presently, and we will not come to estimates; we will come to absolute outlays. I am speaking of the coming year, because, in considering this question, I do not propose to be limited in my inquiry or my comments by the mere question whether we shall apply the money to pay the interest now due on these bonds. I think in doing that it is proper for us to look into what other appropriations we may be called upon to make and to understand ourselves to what we are committed under the construction of law adopted by this commission, and what they propose to commit us to in the future. I will just state one fact, that so far from these estimates being likely to be reduced, if we take the history of the past, they are likely to be quadrupled; I mean the history of the past where estimates were made by Shepherd and by his people—yes, and by this present commission. I will presently show the Senator that they have exceeded them twenty-fold, and then he may have an opportunity to explain if he is willing or able to do so.

For instance, here is the estimated cost of repaving Pennsylvania avenue, which was paved with wooden blocks in 1871, and is to-day one of the worst streets to ride over imaginable, and none of us but would prefer a common country road that it does not cost $100 per mile annually to keep in order to drive over than Pennsylvania avenue. The estimated cost at page 255 of this book is $286,666. Pennsylvania avenue is now graded, and all that is to be done is to take up the present blocks and put others down, and much expense that was originally incurred when the pavement was laid is thereby made unnecessary. There are between the Capitol and Fifteenth street 67,890 square yards superficial area of this wooden pavement. You will not find that in this report, but you will find it from the survey made and reported to Congress at the time the first pavement was laid. But at page 237 of the report the commissioners give a statement of the cost of laying pavement. They say a concrete pavement of more than the usual thickness cost $3.70 per square yard because its thickness was increased from six to ten inches when compressed. Estimating the concrete pavement at $3.70 per square yard, if paid for in 3.65 bonds, and you would have an equivalent of $2.59 in cash, at one hundred cents to the dollar, which would be $175,835. My attention has been drawn to the fact that between Ninth and Tenth streets, on the Avenue, a square has been already laid in concrete which cost $8,800, which may be deducted from the cost of laying 67,890 square yards, making the actual cost $167,000, and not $286,666, as this commission estimate.

There is a case in which what ought to be the cost, if you figure it out, is put against the excessive estimate. But I want to turn to something else. I have said before that this is a proposition of spending five and a half million dollars in the next year upon streets which the joint committee were led to believe and reported unanimously as being although "expensive to inaugurate yet easily kept in order in future, making the burden of expense of carriage-ways comparatively light." If these be "light" burdens, Heaven help us when we come to bear what this commission shall consider heavy ones!

When Mr. Shepherd was examined before this committee in 1874, and was legislated out of office, he made a statement under oath, under the direction of the committee, and submitted tabulated statements of the contracts for "improvements made by the District government or any department thereof, their lists, their dates, the names of the contractors, the nature of the work to be done, the prices to be paid therefor, when and in what medium of funds to be paid; and the aggregate cost under each contract, if completed; and how much has been paid under each contract not yet completed, and how much remains to be paid thereon." According to the report of the committee in 1874, found at page 4 of their report, he submitted "a list of contracts not yet completed, with the estimated cost of the completion of the work under them, amounting in all to $1,325,911.62;" and for that sum he submits a careful estimate or tabulated report as to each claim, set down according to the demands of the committee. Instead of that, the commission in 1874 spent some $600,000, and in 1874-'75 they spent $4,200,000 and upward, on this same alleged uncompleted work. To use the language of the committee, "the total amount that may be funded" for all the debts, including Mr. Shepherd's $1,325,000, was $8,305,886.50, I read from page 14 of their report, and this day there have been issued $13,775,900. That amount was issued up to the 25th of January. I presume and hope none has been issued since; but it is proposed to increase that to $15,000,000, so that instead of having this $1,325,000 due on incomplete contracts, we will have more than $5,000,000 in excess of that amount.

I want to show upon what a system of estimates this has been done. I take one as a specimen of numerous cases, for I do not care to detain the Senate now, and this matter will become I am sure, and I trust by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress, the subject of a careful investigation; for if there be misapprehension, if there has been by me misapprehension or injustice done anywhere or to any one, I shall feel it a favor if I shall be permitted to undo it so far as I may. My object here is to be perfectly just to every man and to condemn no one without a fair hearing, at the same time not to shrink from the unveiling and correction of a wrong, let who will suffer by the disclosure. There was a claim reported by Mr. Shepherd, No. 131, which is to be found at page 249 of his answer, in the first volume of the committee's report; and I will ask those who take an interest in this matter simply to follow the history of this claim. Mr. Shepherd reported that claim, No. 131, was founded on a contract dated the 3d of November, 1871, to grade and gravel B street north, to commence at First street east and run to Eleventh street east. This contract was awarded to Joseph S. Weems. The estimated cost was $975.45, and a marginal note states the "cost so far as done by Weems." At page 342 of the same book we find from Mr. Shepherd's report claim No. 131, that Joseph S. Weems had been paid $1,450; that the estimated cost was $975; that the actual cost over the estimate was $474; which is 50 per cent. additional. Mr. Shepherd returns that contract as "complete." Now I turn to page 396 of the present commissioners' report, under the tabular statement of contracts under the board of public works recognized by the commissioners of the District subsequent to their report of November, 1874, and allowed to proceed. This was a contract which was stated by Mr. Shepherd to be "complete." It had already been overpaid 50 per cent., and they state that they allowed it to proceed. Now let us see how it "proceeded." Report No. 131, a contract entered into on the 3d of November, 1871, with Joseph S. Weems, to "grade and gravel B street north, from First to Eleventh streets east." This contract was extended to Joseph Smolinski, to "grade B street between First and Eleventh streets northeast." It was further extended to "set curbs and lay brick foot-walks on the north side of B street between Eighth and Eleventh streets northeast." That is one side of three blocks of curbing. There was paid to Mr. Smolinski $17,890.68 for a contract originally contracted to be performed for $975. A marginal note states that it was—Brought up for consideration by petition of citizens for completement of improvement. Additional work partially completes the improvements. Mr. Smolinski put on in place of former contractor, deceased.

It will be answered that there was additional work to be done. That is true; but what was the additional work to be done? It was the curbing for three blocks on one side and then laying brick walks. Deduct liberally; if you please, take $3,000, which is more than any amount I ever heard in any other town than Washington, for the work of paving one side of the sideway of three blocks, and you have an estimate of less than $1,000, while here you have a payment of thirteen or fourteen times that amount. Let the honorable Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] suppose that in this estimate we are to have the same ratio, and that for every thousand dollars estimated for we are to pay fourteen or fifteen or seventeen or eighteen thousand, and then I think he will be as much shocked as I, and as much disappointed as when he supposes that the actual outlay always shrinks below the original estimate. We know as a fact that it is just the other way. The original estimate and the original contract are the entering-wedge, and when they once put it in under this system they drive it easily quickly to the head.

There was another claim, No. 561, John J. Shipman, which was referred to by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] yesterday, and therefore I do not care to detain the Senate by again reading it. I will give the figures, however. The claim is found, first, on page 288 of the governor's answer. It is specifically stated in detail. The work to be executed is there stated plainly. He understood the work to be done because it is set forth at length. He contracted to execute the contract for $2,500, and up to this day he has been paid $202,000, and $18,000 more remain to be expended to complete the work. Those figures all appear on these reports. These are but two cases. I will not say that they may not be explained. I will not say that they involve turpitude at all in the commissioners; but, whether the commissioners act by ignorance or act from the worst motive, (which I do not at all impute to them, I prefer to have the facts; and when I have them I will make the statement of the charge directly if it be warranted.) At this time I admit that these figures may possibly be open to an explanation, and I think it is one that the American people will insist upon having before they will permit this state of things. We continue to wonder that the debt of this District is $25,000,000 or more when an estimate for work upon a road-way, which every man understands, can grow from $2,500 to upward of $200,000. No country can stand it. There is a limit to human capacity to pay. We all know that when men are pressed too hard their honesty and their desire to meet their contracts will be worn out. It is vain to sing pæans to public credit and to national honor, and do those things which make it impossible to preserve either. I do not know the fact, but I have been credibly informed that, while the tax-payers of this District were with their private moneys fighting Shepherd and his confederates before the joint committee and Shepherd was defending himself, as he had a perfect right to do, by counsel, the private counsel of these discarded officials were paid in the same 3.65 bonds very large fees for defending that which was admitted to be so wrong that it was legislated out of existence. Is that so or is it not so? I am told those counsel have been paid, paid by the people of the United States, paid by the people of this District, for defending a wrong so flagitious that the very capacity to perform it has been swept from the statute-book by an almost unanimous vote of Congress. I am told that they have paid $25,000 in money to one of their party papers for advertising the testimony taken before that committee which exposed the disgrace of those to whom power had been intrusted by this District. Is this so? I do not know that it is so, but I am told that it is so. Gentlemen who have interrupted me in this debate perhaps may know. The fact, however, I trust will be easily ascertained; and I say it behooves those who mean to defend the action of the commissioners to answer such a respectful question as that.

It is not necessary for me to read more specimens of the manner in which these claims have been exaggerated from thousands into tens of thousands, from tens of thousands into hundreds of thousands, to be paid for by the people of this country. I will only say that I have had handed to me papers in abundance, which I trust some committee charged with this subject shall hereafter investigate. One illustration is sufficient. If it be so in one case it is enough to warrant our action and to arrest the possibility of such things continuing in the future.

This commission did not proceed in ignorance. There was a protest made by the tax-payers' meeting. They called upon these gentlemen, communicated with them in writing, sent them copies of resolutions adopted, besought them to stay this system of expenditure, and asked for legal warrant for what was being done then, but it had no effect. It certainly did not stop it. They were received, they say, with politeness, but it was an empty politeness because no answer was secured and no redress obtained. They were, so to speak, simply bowed out of their presence. Now, I state it as a fact known to every member of the Senate, that such a state of affairs would be impossible in a community which had the right of self-government. There is not a town in the State in which the honorable Senator from Ohio lives, nor of his friend from Illinois, which would permit for one hour after the fact was known the continuance in office of men who created or consented to such expenditures. The people of any town would be horrified; they would know it meant bankruptcy to them and disgrace to their credit. They would know it meant robbery under the shape and forms of taxation. Vigilance committees have swept city governments from existence before now for one-half the wrong that has been done in this District. This is the state of things that we are asked to approve. This is the state of things we are asked to continue, and then go back to our people and tell them we have represented your interest in the Congress of the United States. We cannot as honest men stand by and see wrongs done and not denounce such conduct if it is in our power. No, Mr. President; we must stop the capacity to issue bonds, which has been so misunderstood and so maladministered. We are not safe when such things can be; and the reformation must be deep and thorough in that respect. More than that; we must not only stop the bonds, but the influences which have prevailed in this District since 1871 must be changed. We owe it to the credit of the American people to change it. A public opinion, honest and determined and intelligent, will check it, and it calls upon us to-day to do that which we may for the purpose of arresting further steps in this direction.

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited: And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

Those are wholesome and necessary provisions to be put in. The law itself under which the bonds are issued forms not only an implied notice, a constructive notice, but it forms an absolute notice, and of its own force it enters into that contract and controls it. That at least is my opinion as a lawyer. I trust it will be in order, and it is in order, I believe, and it is my purpose, if I be present at the time when this is decided, to move again the restoration of those provisos when the bill comes into the Senate. They have been stricken out in committee I understand. It was done without debate. No vote was called upon it, and I and most of those who favor the presence of these provisos were really unaware that the Senate had acted upon it. So far from agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] that these bonds shall be issued still further to the extent of $15,000,000, I say stop to-day. Not one should go out in the light of the facts which we have had here before the Senate. The present emission is $13,775,900 of these bonds. They have been issued. The question can be considered hereafter whether there has been covin, whether there has been collusion between the parties who received and the parties who caused the issue. Let that be decided hereafter, but do not let us act hurriedly on behalf of a people so needing care, so needing consideration as the people of this country do to-day, for the sake of keeping up the price of these bonds which are held in the District, and held in large quantities, and held for the purpose of being advanced in price and the consequent profit. I say that consideration weighs not with me at all. On the contrary, I cannot say that I have any sympathy with those who have speculated upon the issue of bonds like these, issued under such laws and under such circumstances as the public records of the Senate disclose. For that reason I shall move at the proper time that these provisos be restored. I do not care to detain the Senate longer. I think the subject one of grave importance, and therefore have said what I have, only wishing that I would, as, if my duties had assigned me to the appropriate committee, I certainly should, have examined the question more fully than I have; but knowing as much as I do now, as I was informed, I should have felt myself delinquent if I had failed in stating my conclusions to the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate, in the first place, to the simple character of this bill and what it proposes to do:

To transfer to the Treasurer of the United States, for the payment of the interest due the 1st of February, 1876, on the bonds of said District, issued under the provisions of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia," &c., "the sum necessary to pay the same from any unexpended appropriations heretofore made by Congress, or from any revenues derived by taxation on the property of said District of Columbia, subject to the requisition of said commissioners, excluding funds raised for the support of public schools."

On that bill we have had a disquisition upon the affairs of the District under the old District government; the history of the board of public works has been reviewed; the charges of maladministration have been renewed and presented in the strongest possible colors; and the present commissioners of this District have been substantially charged with having increased this debt $5,000,000 since they came in, and with having done so in violation of the law.

Mr. President, as I said yesterday, I did not vote for this law, and so far as any personal responsibility is concerned it does not rest on me. The Senator from Delaware has wholly failed to show—and that was the point it seems to me for him to show—how and wherein these commissioners have violated the law. An attempt was made yesterday to show that they had given to this law a wrong construction, and that the officers of the Treasury had treated a class of claims as included in it, and had issued for them 3.65 bonds, that were not included under the law. It was a very nice construction contended for, and I believe wholly unsound. I think the claim was entirely answered by showing that they had given to this law its reasonable and proper construction. Those who voted for the law are therefore responsible for its legitimate operation. If the completion of these contracts is properly covered by that law, then the responsibility does not rest with the commissioners, but rests with the Congress that made the law. The fault in that case is not with the commissioners, but the fault is with the law; and I understood from the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that but one Senator voted against it. The law certainly was not a republican measure in any sense. If I am not mistaken, my friend from Ohio had much to do with the framing of that law, and if, under the proper construction of it, these bonds have been issued, I would like to know whether it can be laid at the door of the Administration or of the republican party, or if political capital can be made out of it. If it is intended to charge these commissioners with fraud—and that is the only thing that is left; if they have not improperly construed the law but otherwise there has been maladministration, it is fraud, it is misconduct, or it is gross recklessness on their part—I say, if it is intended to make that charge, I shall leave their vindication for the present to their general character. They are men of as high character as any men in the Senate; men hitherto of spotless reputation, I believe, so far as integrity is concerned; and I presume they can stand the test of any examination that can be made.

An examination of this report will show that this $5,000,000 of increase of debt has not been made by these commissioners. The most of it is the unliquidated debt that came down from the board of public works that has since been audited and put into a certified form, and for which bonds have been issued. They have carried out some of these contracts, and they were required to do it by the law. If the contracts were valid, they could not repudiate them any more than the board of public works who made them could repudiate them, and this law expressly gave them power to make new contracts to carry out old contracts. The fault then is with the law and with the law-makers, and not with the commissioners.

The Senator from Delaware made a remark in the conclusion of his speech to which I call the attention of the Senate. After enumerating all these alleged wrongs, he said that such a state of facts could not exist in any community in which the people have the right of self-government. Who voted to destroy the right of self-government in this District? Who is now in favor of ruling this District by commissioners or by regents, or whatever the name may be? I believe myself that outrages cannot be continued under popular government, either here or elsewhere; that the necessity of accounting to the people every year, or every two years, will stop these things, I do not care how ignorant the voters may be. Popular government was stricken down here, and it was stricken down with the approbation of every democratic member of the Senate, so far as I know. The Senator himself says that in a community where the right of self-government exists these wrongs could not take place.

Now, we have to deal with the existing bonds. We are providing for paying the interest upon them. The Senator from Delaware has not undertaken to show wherein a wrong construction has been given to this law. These bonds are the creation of a law which received almost the unanimous support of this body. If there is anything wrong about these bonds, throw the responsibility upon the law and not upon the commissioners or upon the board of audit. They have undertaken to act, and, so far as I know, I believe they have acted, in good faith in the execution of this law. They found contracts executed by the board of public works. They could not repudiate them. They were bound by the terms of the law to carry them out so far as those contracts were legal. If the amount of those contracts exceeded the estimate that had been made by the old board of public works when the examination took place, are they responsible? Certainly not. The estimate might have been an underestimate; it might have been a false estimate; but who will hold these commissioners responsible for a false or a mistaken estimate? They were bound to execute these contracts if they were valid, and if they greatly exceeded the amount supposed at that time the fault is not theirs.

Mr. BOGY. I wish to ask the Senator one question. Where is the evidence of the facts which he states now? I know of no such evidence submitted to us.

Mr. MORTON. The evidence of that fact is found in the report of the commissioners themselves.

Mr. BOGY. I have not seen it.

Mr MORTON. They report for what purpose these bonds have been issued, and they report, I believe, the amount of debt for which the parties holding them are entitled to have new bonds. Has their report been discredited? Their report will be taken as evidence here until it is contradicted by evidence of a higher character, I undertake to say. It is an official report, and it will be taken as prima facie correct until there is something brought to contradict it.

Senators talk about these repairs and these street improvements. I again call my friends back to this simple proposition that I spoke of yesterday: Whether this law has been properly construed or not is not the question. When you struck down popular government in this District, when you gave to Congress absolute control of these people and took away from them all political right whatever, you took upon you the responsibility of providing for these streets.

Mr. STEVENSON. May I ask the Senator if under the popular suffrage which did exist here all these corruptions did not spring up, and whether a majority of his own party, by a committee here, during that popular suffrage, did not report that the frauds and outrages in this District could scarcely be enumerated?

Mr. MORTON. I do not think the report said "could scarcely be enumerated." If there is such a clause as that in the report I have not seen it.

The Senator from Kentucky asks me the very pertinent question whether all these alleged wrongs did not grow out of popular government by the people of this District. I have understood heretofore that the board of public works which has been charged with these enormities was not an elective government but an appointed government. Am I right? My friend says he does not know. I think almost everybody else does know that the board of public works was appointed by the President and was not elected by the people. That is the thing I complained of in the beginning, that this debt that is complained of was not saddled upon these people, whether rightfully or wrongfully, by the government elected by themselves, but was saddled upon them by an appointed government; and, as my friend from Delaware said, perhaps no community governed by itself would have done that thing. I understood my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] yesterday to say that this board of public works had gone on to make these contracts without authority of law and without receiving that sanction of the territorial Legislature which the Congress of the United States had required. I think I am not mistaken about that. He himself said it was a disregard of the popular part of the old government that brought these things upon the people.

Mr. STEVENSON. Let me ask the Senator whether the committee, a majority of which were republicans, did not recommend a change of government in this District, and whether their report was not founded upon misgovernment?

Mr. MORTON. I believe the committee perhaps were unanimous in recommending that change. So far as I know, they were. In striking down that government and putting this one in its place it was only intended to be temporary. By its own limitation the existing government by commissioners was to expire in nine months. Am I right about that?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. It was to supply an interregnum, and then a committee was appointed by the two Houses to prepare a system of government; but when it was offered, that system of government was rejected, and that temporary government has become a permanent government; at least it looks as if it had.

Mr. President, the complaint in regard to popular government fails. If Senators complain of an appointed government, let them remember that they are responsible for it in part. When the old board of public works was appointed it was not a party measure. It was created, I believe, by the votes of both parties. That government was not in its character a party government. Then the simple question is in regard to paying the interest on these bonds. The Senator from Delaware wants to re-assert the provision that bonds which have been unlawfully issued shall not be paid. That leaves the intimation that some of them were unlawfully issued and throws discredit upon the whole of them. Three-sixty-five bonds are now selling for only sixty-nine or seventy cents on the dollar. Who is responsible for that bond? I thought it was a mistake in the beginning; I never should have voted for the issuing of a bond of that character. That was not a party measure. It belonged equally to both sides of this Chamber. If the bond was a mistake it cannot be said to be a republican mistake. If any party capital is to be made it cannot come out of the bond question, and I conclude by the simple proposition that the Senators and Representatives who voted for that law voted to complete the contracts made by the board of public works, be they many or be they few——

Mr. BAYARD. Legal or illegal?

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; legal. They voted to complete them, be they many or be they few, and they voted to pay them in 3.65 bonds; and we should not now repudiate them.

Mr. SHERMAN. They left the question of legality to the board of audit.

Mr. MORTON. Certainly, they voted to leave the question of legality to the board of audit, officers of the United States Government. That board have decided it; and, until it be shown they have decided it ignorantly or have decided it falsely, there ought to be no very serious charges made against this commission who never issued a bond and cannot issue a bond. Therefore, in conclusion——

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the Senator allow me? Just now he asked me whether the board of public works was elective or not, and he said that all these alleged frauds arose from the action of the board of public works. Will he now allow me to ask whether the Legislature, which was elected by popular suffrage, did not approve of these contracts, and did they not thereby make them their own?

Mr. MORTON. I will simply answer the Senator from Kentucky in the language of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] yesterday. It was a point made by him that the contracts made by the board of public works did not receive the sanction and were not provided for by appropriations by the District Legislature as the law required; and I understood my friend from Ohio to throw the responsibility upon the board of public works. All the occasion I have to talk about the board of public works here to-day—for I am neither entering into its defense, nor am I meeting it with crimination—is simply to say that these wrongs that are talked about, whatever they may be, were not made by popular government, but were made by an appointed government; and I conclude what I have to say by the simple statement again that those who voted for this law voted to complete every legal contract made by the board of public works, be they few or be they many, and voted to pay therefor in 3.65 bonds.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I do not think I should have troubled the Senate with another remark on this subject but for the extraordinary speeches that have been made by the Senator from Indiana. I do not know that they can be considered extraordinary either, for perhaps some who hear me say that would think they are of the most ordinary course of his speaking. It seems to be impossible to assail corruption in the Government in any of its various forms that the Senator from Indiana does not consider it an attack upon the republican party, and feel it to be his duty to put on his armor, take his shield on his arm and his sword in his hand, and come to the defense of that organization. I think that up to the time the Senator from Indiana entered into this discussion not one word of a partisan character had been uttered in the debate. I am sure I uttered none in the remarks I submitted to the Senate the other day. No one could have told from anything that I said what were my politics or what were my inclinations. I heard nothing of the kind from any source; but as soon as the Senator from Indiana got the floor he commenced by assailing the law and ended by assailing what he called the deprivation of popular sovereignty, or popular election; I do not think he used the word "sovereignty," for he has a great dislike to that word; but he urged that the popular principle was destroyed by this bill, and he forthwith went to work to arraign Congress because it had destroyed the popular principle of representation in a bill that was confessedly but a temporary measure, merely to provide a temporary government until Congress should form a permanent government, and which no one who advocated the bill when it was before the Senate supposed would last more than nine months at the outside. Then there arose a great cry upon the destruction of the republican principle of our Government and the destruction of popular suffrage, as if the Congress of the United States had entered into a conspiracy to deprive the people of the United States of the right of suffrage. Well, sir, it was a very large structure upon a very small basis. There was the slightest possible occasion for coming out here as a great defender of the right of suffrage. This District had to be put in the hands of some kind of a commission for nine months until a government could be framed, and we put it in by the vote of every Senator here but one, and into the hands of these commissioners by the vote of every Representative in the other House but twenty-two. No measure perhaps of equal importance ever received such unanimous support. But now comes the Senator from Indiana and says he did not vote for it. Why did he not vote against it? Why did he not speak against it? He says he was never in favor of these 3.65 bonds. Why did he not denounce them?

Mr. MORTON. Do you want an answer?

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have an answer.

Mr. MORTON. I was not present that afternoon when it passed.

Mr. THURMAN. It would have been very easy to move a reconsideration, or get some one to move a reconsideration. That bill did not go through in the dark. That bill was not forced through by any previous question either here or in the other House. That bill was subjected to discussion. It was easy enough for the Senator before that Congress adjourned to have asked some friend to move a reconsideration, and to have opposed the bill, and have opposed this 3.65 bond proposition if it was wrong.

But, sir, it did not stand on that alone. The Senator had an opportunity afterward, when he was in the Senate. Before the President signed that bill, he sent a message to Congress asking us to put the rate of interest on the bonds at a greater rate than 3.65 per cent. Where was the Senator from Indiana then? That message was referred to the committee that reported the bill. The motion to refer was a debatable motion; it opened the merits of the whole question. Then the Senator from Indiana had the fullest opportunity to show that this proposition to pay in 3.65 bonds was unwise or unjust, if such were indeed the fact. But the Senator was as dumb as an oyster when this thing was being done; and now, nearly two years afterward, he comes to read us a lecture, in the light of his after-acquired wisdom, and to censure the Senate and the House of Representatives for passing a law which the whole Senate then, with the exception of one member, and the whole House of Representatives, with the exception of twenty-two, thought was the best thing that then could be done.

Mr. President, I shall not go over the points that have been so fully discussed; but one thing I must say in reference to this Legislature. I was on the committee of conference that reported the first bill, under which the Shepherd government was organized, as it has been called, and for brevity may be called, in 1871. I was utterly opposed to it. I refused to sign the conference report. I thought it was establishing altogether too magnificent a government for this District. I refused to sign the report, therefore, and voted against the bill. So no responsibility rests on me for that government, which fell, and so disgracefully fell, at the end of three years. That government went on. It found this District with an indebtedness of something over $4,000,000; it left it with an indebtedness of more than $20,000,000 in three years. How did that come to pass? The Senator from Indiana says that was not the fault of the representative clauses in that government. I say it was in part the fault of them, but not alone; for how was it? That organic act declared that no contract made by the board of public works for improvements should be valid unless an appropriation had previously been made to defray the expense of the work. It submitted to the Legislative Assembly what was called its comprehensive plan of improvements, estimating the cost at $6,000,000 in round numbers. The Legislative Assembly approved the plan, but with this limitation, that they might contract for the work, provided they did so at a cost of 20 per cent. less than the estimated cost; thus cutting down the appropriation to $4,000,000 instead of $6,000,000, the estimated cost. What attention did the board of public works pay to that limitation or to the provision in the organic law? Really scarcely any attention at all; and now was there no blame on the part of this Legislative Assembly? Did not the Legislative Assembly see this board of public works violating the law day by day, and involving the people of this District into this enormous debt beyond the appropriation; and did it interpose? Did it do anything to stop it? No, sir; nothing at all; but, on the contrary, it was as notorious as that the District exists itself that the Legislature was the mere creature of the board of public works. Instead of the popular branch of the government defending the rights of the people and the interests of the District against this encroaching and usurping board of public works, there was never a slave in this District perhaps more completely owned by his master than was that Legislative Assembly by the board of public works. Every one is conversant with the facts, and every one who heard the testimony that for more than three months your committee was engaged in taking knows that to be the fact. Why, sir, it had no will of its own. It was the creature of the board of public works, and the board of public works was one man in effect. That is the true history of this business.

That government failed. It has been said that there were no charges in our report of corruption on the part of particular individuals. That has been said a great deal, and the absence of such charges has been taken as a vindication of the officials in that government. Such never was the intention of the committee. I must say something on that subject to correct this popular error.

That committee sat nearly four months. No committee of this body or of Congress ever performed as much labor, except perhaps some of the committees that went perambulating the whole country. No one ever performed a more disagreeable labor. No committee ever performed its labor in more perfect good faith and more freedom from partisanship of any kind. I say it, although I belonged to it. I know the labors we performed; I know what suffering they entailed upon us in ill-health, in discomfort, and in being deprived of our seats in the Senate and in the House; and I am not disposed to hear that committee criticized unjustly in the light of other people's doings long after that committee has ceased to exist. That committee went on taking testimony. It had to employ an engineer to remeasure the work; and after we had sat until June, and the session of Congress was approaching its termination, we had, so to speak, but barely got into the crust, barely broken the shell of the egg. Some of the most important testimony that we received grew out of the remeasurements made by the engineer the committee employed—a most able and honorable man—and they showed in almost every instance that the District officials had overestimated, had returned false measurements; exaggerated measurements; and not only that, they showed further that more than the contract price had been paid even upon these exaggerated estimates—estimates of work done greatly in exaggeration of the truth, and then payments upon the contracts in excess of these exaggerated estimates. We got instance after instance of it. It would have taken perhaps six months of engineering, of remeasuring the work, of ascertaining what was the condition of the streets and alleys and the like at the time that the contracts were let so that an engineer could remeasure the work to ascertain the whole extended enormity of these overmeasurements and of these overpayments.

Sir, as I said, with this vast volume of testimony before us and the session of Congress nearly at an end, what could that committee do? We were unanimous that the government was a shameless failure; we were unanimous that that government ought to be put an end to; but if we had gone into specific accusations against this man or that man or the other man, there would have been no doubt a diversity of opinion among the members of the committee and great injustice would have been done, for the committee executed its duties from a public point of view. The committee did not consider that it was a grand jury to return indictments against particular individuals, but that it was a public, political committee to see whether or not the government then existing ought to be perpetuated or ought to be abolished. There were higher public duties than the indictment of any particular individual; and to these higher public duties that committee devoted itself and devoted itself faithfully; and we made the report therefore which we could make, unanimously, that the District government was a failure, and that some other government ought to be inaugurated in its stead. Had we taken the other course and brought in an indictment against this man and that man and the other man, no measure of redress would have been passed at all; the whole time of the session would have been wasted in discussions upon the guilt of particular individuals, instead of Congress devoting itself to relieve the District from a government that was wrong and oppressive, and that had utterly failed.

Therefore, Mr. President, the truth is that no inference whatever in respect either to the guilt or innocence of any officer of the old government, or of any individual, is to be drawn from the silence of the committee on that subject. The committee confined itself to the public consideration in order that it might be unanimous in its report; that it might unanimously report a bill, and that that bill might secure the approbation of both Houses of Congress and become a law in the few remaining days of the session.

I have said thus much in vindication of the committee as it seemed to be necessary because the Senator from Indiana keeps reminding the Senate that, if anybody is to blame, it is the law that is to blame, and that I had some share in that committee. Yes, sir, I had, and in the framing of this law, and never did I bestow more pains upon any work and endeavor to do it more to my own satisfaction under the adverse circumstances by which we were surrounded, and I am here to defend it and to say that that law, upon a fair construction of it, upon a fair interpretation of it, was a good, wise, and proper law.

Now, says the Senator, that law made it the duty of these present commissioners to carry out all the legal contracts that had been entered into by the board of public works. Suppose that were so, did that give them power to do what it is said has been done? When I spoke the other day I had not looked into their recent report at all. I had not seen it. I had seen their report of last year, but I had not read that, and I had not even seen their report of this year. But let us see what that law authorized them to do. Certainly it did not authorize them to execute any but legal contracts. Nobody will pretend that it did more than that. The very organic law under which the board of public works existed provided that no contract made by them which was not in writing, and no contract for which an appropriation had not been made, should have any validity. Will anybody pretend that all these contracts were contracts for which appropriations had been made? It cannot be pretended for a moment; the fact is not so, and if they had availed themselves, as they had a right to do, and as they are doing at this very day—these very commissioners are doing it now—of that clause in the organic law that the contract was void because it was made before any appropriation was made for it, they would have had no millions of contracts to carry out in the way that it is said they supposed they had. I say they avail themselves now of the defense they are making, for they understand it. What does their report say? What does the report of the solicitor of the District show? It shows that suits have been brought by contractors against this District; and these very three commissioners have come in and filed their answer, by way of defense, alleging that there was no appropriation for that work for which the contract was made, and therefore the contract under the organic law was void. A perfectly sound and valid defense, and one that might have been used far more, I fancy, than it has been used.

But the Senator from Indiana harps upon the point that they could make new contracts to execute old contracts; but does he suppose that that this law, under the authority to complete a contract, gave them the power to make a new contract, which was to enhance the expense three or four fold? Is that carying out the old contract? What was the reason that that provision was put in? I explained it the other day. The work on the streets was nearly done; nobody was doing any more work on the streets. The contracts for improvements on the streets that had been made were scarcely one of them valid, because they were made without any appropriation having been made beforehand. Again, a large amount of work had been done under what were called awards, wholly illegal, without any written contract at all. A man sent in a bid that he would lay a wooden pavement at so much a square yard, or concrete at so much a square yard, or the like, and it was filed with the board of public works, and some time afterward he would go to Mr. Shepherd, and Mr. Shepherd would assign him such a street, or a portion of such a street, for him to go to work upon, without any written contract at all, none whatever such as the law contemplated. There were those things. They were not bound to pay the least attention to them. They amounted, according to Lieutenant Hoxie's report of 1874, to $480,000. It would have taken that sum to complete these contracts under what were called awards, not one of which was a legal contract.

Mr. MORTON. Not in writing?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. I am informed that every one of those was rejected by these commissioners.

Mr. THURMAN. That is just what I suppose they have done. They ought to have rejected every one of them, and I suppose they have done it. Rejected them, why? For two reasons: first, that they were not in writing as the organic law required them to be; and, in the second place, because no appropriation had been made for those works. Therefore they were forbidden by the organic law.

But, sir, there were contracts for which appropriations had been made, for which written contracts had been executed, and some of those were incomplete when this law passed. What was expected of these commissioners? That they were to go on with such means as they had during their little interval of government here of nine months and preserve these works from destruction, and to let them be executed as far as it was in their power to do it. That was it; but was it the idea that they were to enter into any comprehensive scheme of improvements? No, sir; and they did not so understand it at first, for what did they do? They went into power in June or July, 1874; they made their first report in December, 1874. Had they then embarked in any of this comprehensive scheme of improvements which has since been carried on in the last year? No, sir; nothing of that sort; but as Congress failed last winter to establish a permanent government for this District, then the idea seems to have gotten into somebody's head in this District that this commission was to be the permanent form of government here, and then, all at once, there is an enlargement of idea as to the powers of the commission, and a very different interpretation placed upon this act under which they were appointed.

This law which we enacted, in view of the provision of the organic act that contracts should be in writing, authorized the board of audit to audit claims arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works. It may be said, why is that provision "oral" put in there? Because of this state of facts: It was not the intention of the organic law that when the board of public works employed a clerk or a messenger or a servant to sweep out their room or make their fires they were to enter into a written contract with him. The contracts referred to in the organic act were contracts for public improvements and not contracts for the mere clerical or menial service that might be required by that board. Furthermore, the board could itself, with its own engineers and its own laborers, as I said the other day, go on and do a great deal of this work. The organic law did not require that the work should be let by contract. When it did that it was not expected, of course, that a laborer, although he might be employed for a day or half a day, should have a written contract with the board of public works. They were employed orally, just as laborers are employed by contractors. There was a very considerable amount due to them; they were considered among the most meritorious persons, and therefore that clause was put in which embraced their case under the word "oral."

While I am on this subject let me call the attention of the Senate to another thing. I spoke the other day of our estimate that at the outside not over $12,000,000 of 3.65 bonds could be issued. I did not advert at the time to the fact that the amount which we estimated would be issued, or ought to be issued, was only something rising $8,000,000. That will be found in the report; and perhaps some one has already called the attention of the Senate to it. We estimated this floating indebtedness, including what it would take to complete the contracts that were then incomplete, at something less than $12,000,000; but we estimated the amount of debt which would be funded into 3.65 bonds at only a little over $8,000,000. Why was that? Why was it that we did not estimate the amount of bonds all the way up to eleven million dollars and a fraction? Because we recommended an appropriation by Congress to pay a large portion of that public debt, and upon our recommendation Congress did pass an act at that very session by which they appropriated, I think, over $1,000,000. I will thank the chairman to tell me exactly what it was.

Mr. ALLISON. One million three hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SARGENT. For current expenses.

Mr. ALLISON. We levied a tax of 3 per cent. also.

Mr. SARGENT. To raise an equal amount to govern the District the next year.

Mr. ALLISON. Not at all.

Mr. THURMAN. That $1,300,000, I think it will be found on looking at it, nearly or quite the whole of it, was to pay the laborers who were unpaid. They were not to take 3.65 bonds, but it was to pay these very laboring men, if I am not mistaken, and if I am I wish my friend from Iowa to correct me.

Mr. ALLISON. A portion of it was to be used to pay laborers; a portion to pay immediate debts that had been created by the government of the District of Columbia, such as bank debts in New York and various things of that sort.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir; I remember it now. Here was the state of the case—a very nice piece of financiering indeed. The District government had gone to New York and borrowed money, and had pledged collaterals at a perfectly ruinous rate—the securities of the District—the bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the District. I think it had pledged none of them perhaps at less than $2 of collateral for $1 of debt. Those securities were liable to be sold on the stock exchange in New York, or wherever they would be permitted to be sold, at any moment, and thus double the debt of the District, unless Congress would come to their aid and pay off the debt; and part of that $1.300,000 was for that purpose—to prevent doubling the debt of the District by the sale of these collaterals by the money-lenders who had loaned money upon them.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire if the Senator would have us to understand that all the appropriations made by Congress at that time were for past indebtedness of the District? In other words, whether it left the District to struggle along by the commissioners getting what they could from taxation without any help from the General Government except wiping off old scores?

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say any such thing. Congress acted with great liberality toward the District. All that I said was that Congress made this appropriation of $1,300,000, part of it to pay laborers and the rest of it to pay for this same floating debt, for it belonged to the floating debt, which was held in the city of New York; and just to the extent of that appropriation ought the amount of 3.65 bonds that were to be issued to be reduced.

That was the state of the case. And now, sir, I do say again that when Congress had put in all these safeguards it never was imagined that this government, which was to be a mere temporary government, would eventuate in less than two years in a debt of nearly $15,000,000 of 3 65 bonds instead of about eight millions, which we estimated would be the full amount. No, sir, it will not do. I am making no charges against anybody of corruption; but it is the greatest misfortune that ever befel a people, it seems to me, that we cannot put anybody in power in this District, no matter how honest he may be, that he does not forthwith become imbued with the spirit of extravagance, and think that the money must be expended here as if this was a mine of jewels and of gold, which it is only necessary to dig into in order to heap up riches. The grandeur of the city, the grandeur of the public structures, the beauty that is to be found in the city seem to take possession of the mind of everybody who has to deal with it, and forthwith he launches out in a system of extravagance which I agree would not be tolerated elsewhere than in Washington.

Now, Mr. President, a few words more. While we are on this District subject it is just as well to call attention to some other matters, although they have nothing particularly to do with the immediate question which is before us. First let me call your attention to the cost of this government. Take it from the report last made to us. I ask Senators just to listen to the figures taken from that report, and see what the cost of this District government is. I will begin with the board of health. How much do you suppose, Mr. President, was paid for the board of health in the last year? As you may see by reference to page 4 of the report of these District commissioners, $61,481.38. One would certainly suppose that that included everything that could contribute to the health of the city of Washington, but it is not the half of it; for right on the same page we find that the commissioners themselves have paid for removing garbage $6,208; for cleaning and sweeping streets, $43,101; for cleaning alleys, $7,866; for cleaning and sweeping streets and alleys under act of Congress approved March 1, 1875, $21,213; making $78,390 to be added to the $61,481 disbursed by the board of health. All of these subjects, coming really within the province of the preservation of the health of the city, amount to the sum of $139,871; a larger sum than is expended by the State of Vermont for her whole State government. That single board of health and the street cleaning here cost more than it costs to maintain the State government in one of the States of this Union.

Let us pass from that to the fire department. The expenditures for the fire department, including a new fire-alarm telegraph were $173,243. Taking out the new fire-alarm telegraph, which might not be considered part of the ordinary expenses, you have $98,000 for the fire department of Washington City.

Then the board of audit; how much, pray, has this board of audit cost for employés and the like? No less a sum than $45,339.

Mr. SARGENT. They are not responsible for it.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not say they are responsible for it. I am not talking about the responsibility of individuals. That is wherein my friend mistakes all the while. I am not speaking of individuals; I am speaking of a system. But pass that by. Let us come to the engineer department; and what do we find there? For pay of assistant engineer—for mark, the chief engineer is an officer of the Army and has his Army pay, and no extra pay by reason of his being detailed to the duty of engineer here—but for assistant engineer, employés, and expenses of the engineer department, $182,382. That is not making streets; that is not doing work on streets or sewers or the like. That is engineering work. I may be mistaken in saying that it is not for any work done on streets; some of it may be for work that has been done without any contract, under the immediate supervision of the assistant engineer. Probably, therefore, some portion of this—and I do not know how much of it, because we cannot tell—was used to pay laborers who have worked under the direct supervision of the assistant engineer and his assistants. The amount for the engineer department is $182,382. Then the water department is $118,965.

Now I come to what are called salaries, and so on, of the officers and employés of the late board of public works—unpaid salaries—$28,169. Then we come to the salaries of officers and employés and expenses of the several officers of the District government proper, not the engineer department, not the water-works department, not the fire department, not the board of health, but what is called the District government proper, whatever that may be—those people, I suppose, engaged mainly in the collection and disbursement of taxes. How much do you suppose the salaries of those employés and officers of the District government proper come to? the annual amount? $98,864. Then for the office of register of wills, $326.79.

Now, sir, recapitulating these matters, and leaving out the board of audit, we find that the sums for the engineer department, fire department, water department, board of health, cleaning streets, &c., and salaries of other officers aggregate $742,273—about as much as pays every officer of the State of Ohio who holds a State office. Leaving out county and township and municipal officers, and only including those who are State officers, and their clerks, and employés, I venture to say, without having looked at the statistics lately, that the State of Ohio does not cost in all as much as this cost of the District government.

I hope, Mr. President, that these matters will engage the attention of the District committees, so that, both for the sake of the United States and for the sake of this people, some mode of retrenchment and reform and simplicity and economy in government may be inaugurated. It will not be inaugurated, I venture to say, by the system which the Senator from Indiana would advocate, unless he puts upon it such restrictions as I have never yet seen put upon any such government. But whatever the government may be, whether it is to be part appointed or part elected, our duties are plain, and they are two. One is to say what proportion of the expenses will be paid by the United States; and the other is so to lessen expenses that the government shall not be a burden and a disgrace.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, this costly government which the Senator has so painfully enumerated was created by the bill which he drafted. He ought to have devised some cheaper form of government. He enumerates the board of health and tells us of the extravagance of the board of health. I believe it may be said in justification of that expenditure that this has been shown to be the healthiest city in the United States and the death rate has been the smallest. The board of health have been at great pains to look to the health of the Senator and of his friends. He complains also of the expenditures for the water department. Well, Mr. President, those who do not like water may think that is extravagant. [Laughter.] I shall not go into any defense upon that ground. And then he complains of the expenditures of the board of audit. Who created the board of audit? My friend by the little bill which he drafted and caused to be enacted by this body.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from Indiana, as it especially applies to him just now, whether he had not on the score of health a memorial, the result of some public discussion by his peculiar friends the colored people of the District, complaining that they died too fast, four to one of the white men? Ought not that to excite his sympathies?

Mr. MORTON. Well, Mr. President, I understand the meaning of that question. It is that I sympathize with the colored people a great deal more than I do with the white people. I know that it has been the common argument offered in reply to the republican party for twenty years: "You like the nigger a great deal better than you do the white man; don't you want your daughter to marry a nigger?" It was just the same sort of question precisely. I do not think it necessary to answer that any further. I think the health of the colored people should be looked after just as well as the health of the white people and the health of the whole city should be looked after.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio began his speech with some heat, and he intended to be somewhat offensive, I think. He said first that my speech was extraordinary, as if I had uttered something dreadful; and then he said it was an ordinary speech. Now, the Senator from Ohio labors under one difficulty; he never can be severe without being a little personal. He said, in speaking of this law, that when it was under consideration I was as dumb as an oyster. That is an elegant expression! The fact is my friend is always elegant, never otherwise. But he said that in a Pickwickian sense and did not mean to harrow up my feelings particularly. If he had intended to wound me deeply he would have said that I was as dumb as a Bourbon; but only saying I was as dumb as an oyster was a mere phrase.

He went on to excoriate this commission here terribly because they recognized verbal contracts on the part of the board of public works. Yes, sir, verbal contracts, contracts not in writing, contracts therefore not legal he said. He came down fearfully upon them for that reason. My friend has a cunning memory, and after he had gone through all this he happened to remember that in this law which he had drafted this peculiar provision was inserted, which I always thought was pretty loose—I do not think I would have put it in if I had been drafting the law—that this board of audit shall audit claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence has been issued "arising out of contracts, written or oral." After having himself expressly provided that this board of audit should recognize verbal contracts, contracts not valid in law, mere verbal understandings, he brings that home to this commission as a high offense that they have committed in recognizing contracts not valid in point of law, after having, as I think, very loosely provided for doing it. I would not have done it.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator, I suppose, does not wish to misrepresent me. I did not say, and I do not say, that this law provided for their issuing 3.65 bonds for any but legal contracts; and it does not provide for recognizing one single oral contract that was not a legal contract. I went on and explained that certain contracts which were oral contracts might be legal contracts. When the Senator says that I have admitted that the law sanctioned or ratified illegal contracts, I tell him I said nothing of the sort.

Mr. MORTON. Why, Mr. President, after my friend had discoursed at some length about the high misdemeanor on the part of the commissioners in recognizing contracts that were not in writing, and that were not legal contracts because they were not in writing, he then, remembering, as I think, that there was a provision of that kind in the law, undertook to make a little explanation of it which I say, with all respect to my friend, was somewhat lame. Now, he says that the law did not provide that these oral contracts should be paid off by 3.65 bonds. My friend is just as unfortunate in that——

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say any such thing.

Mr. MORTON. Just now?

Mr. THURMAN. No, sir; I said nothing of the sort. I said there was no provision there that 3.65 bonds should be used to pay illegal oral contracts. I did not say they might not be used to pay valid oral contracts.

Mr. MORTON. My friend, I think, only gets a little deeper into the mire in every explanation that he makes. The law provides for paying with 3.65 bonds every one of the class of claims here enumerated, and among this class of claims are unwritten contracts. You may say they were illegal. I would say that a contract that is not valid and binding is not a legal contract, and, therefore, I might assert the converse of the proposition that it is an illegal contract; but I am speaking of their recognizing legal contracts, and they were specially authorized by the law to recognize contracts that were not legal because they were not in writing.

So much upon that point. Now I come to my other proposition. I say that this whole debate on the other side, especially the last speech of my friend from Ohio, is an attempt to fix upon the commissioners, either as a crime or as a blunder, the legitimate consequences of the law which my friend drafted, that the responsibility and the blame, if there be responsibility and blame, are not with the commissioners but with the distinguished legal gentleman who prepared that bill.

One word further and I am done, Mr. President. The Senator from Ohio said that I do not like the use of the word "sovereignty." Well, sir, I do not like the use of the word "sovereign" in connection with the States, but I do love it in connection with the nation, and there is where I differ from my friend. He is fond of the term "sovereign" and "sovereignty" when he speaks of the States, but I think he has never been heard to use it—if he has, it has been very gingerly—when speaking of the nation. There is a great gulf between us on that point. I hope that if it is ever crossed it will be from his side to mine.

I believe, sir, I have said all that I want to say. I can only add that the question here is simply one of providing for the payment of interest upon bonds that so far as we know have been issued in conformity with the act of Congress for which my friend from Ohio, I think, is a little more responsible than any other Senator on this floor.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, one word. The Senator from Indiana conceives himself to be exceedingly smart to-day. He keeps hammering away with an iteration and iteration that justifies the old collocation in the classics of "damnable iteration." He says the responsibility is with the framers of this law. Let us see what kind of logic that is. If Congress frames a law, and those who are to administer it maladminister it, the responsibility is upon Congress! Let us apply that to my friend. He voted for the whisky tax. He voted for the present whisky law. I voted against it, but he voted for it and supported it. Ergo, he is responsible for all the frauds of the whisky ring! That is his logic. Why do not they indict him and try him out at Saint Louis with McKee and the rest of them there? What a monstrous thing it is to say that McKee is to blame, that McDonald is to blame, that McGrew is to blame, that Babcock is to blame. Why do they not say that the responsibility is on Morton? He made the law. [Laughter.] That is logic! It is not necessary to say anything more on that subject, I think.

The Senator says that I happened to think of this word "oral." I knew this law; I helped to make this law, and I am always ready to take my fair responsibility for it. But here [exhibiting some sheets of paper] are the notes that I made the other day when the Senator was speaking, in which I put down this very word "oral," in order to explain it when I should take the floor next, because owing to the interruptions I had neglected to explain it before. It was no new thought with me. The Senator says he would not have had it in the law. He would not have allowed the poor fellows who had swept out the office or brought in the coals to make the fire, or the poor laborers on the streets who had worked in all sorts of weather, good, bad, and indifferent, to be paid. Is that what the Senator means to say? And yet he says that he would not have allowed these oral contracts to be paid. I repeat, Mr. President, there was a class of oral contracts, as I explained, that were perfectly valid, and those it was intended might be paid; but there is not one single word in this law that authorizes the payment, either in money or in 3.65 bonds, of any illegal contract whatsoever, whether written or whether it be unwritten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. SARGENT. If there is any hope that a vote can be taken I am willing to forego any remarks. Otherwise, I desire to offer some observations to the Senate. If a vote can be taken I am willing to yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is as stated by the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish the exact state of the question would be stated to the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. THURMAN. Has any amendment been made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations has been agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. Striking out the proviso in the House bill? Now, what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from California to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. THURMAN. Let both be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will report both the amendments.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is to add to the resolution:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

The amendment of the Senator from California is to add this proviso:

And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment last read as an amendment to the amendment first read.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended.

Mr. BAYARD. I move now to amend the amendment by striking out $15,000,000 and inserting—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The word "$15,000,000" occurs in two places in the amendment.

Mr. BAYARD. I mean to strike it out in each place where it occurs and insert "$8,775,900."

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to ask him to accept this which, I think, will be better? I move to insert in place of the proviso of the Senator from Iowa a proviso in this language:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware accept the amendment suggested by the Senator from New York?

Mr. BAYARD. I do.

Mr. SARGENT. That leaves the certificates outstanding which by the law already existing are to be converted into these bonds. What are you going to do with the certificates? You prohibit the issue of bonds, but leave the certificates afloat. The proposition of the Senator from Iowa amended by the proposition which I offered was that neither of certificates nor bonds shall there be issued beyond the limited amount named.

Mr. KERNAN. In the light of the facts disclosed in this debate it seems to me we should not allow another bond to be issued. I do not interfere with certificates. I propose to allow the other amendment to be as it is; but I offer this amendment because it seems to me we should provide for adjusting those certificates by looking into them before we issue negotiable securities for them if they have not been issued.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from New York may not be aware that these certificates are negotiable, transferable from hand to hand. I had one here the other day. They are convertible into 3.65 bonds, they are issued by the board of audit, and they are convertible into 3.65 bonds, which are delivered to bearer either in registered or coupon bonds. Therefore we cannot preclude the holders of the present certificates from converting them into 3.65 bonds without violating the obligation of the law and the contract.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire if they could be converted after the amendment of the Senator from New York became part of the law?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly not. They could not be converted after the amendment was adopted.

Mr. DAWES. Then what makes them negotiable?

Mr. KERNAN. There is nothing in the law that makes them negotiable securities. They are certificates that there is so much due a man, and I think they are not negotiable; and if they be wrongfully made, if they evidence a debt which ought not to be paid without investigation, we have an opportunity to investigate it while it is held by the man who must adjust it on the right basis. My object was to prevent negotiable bonds getting out for certificates which seem to have been made, judging from this debate, without much regard, it would appear to me, to some of the provisions of this law. What I propose is just. It leaves every man to stand on his equities.

Mr. SHERMAN. All I know about this matter is what I learn from others, and that is that the outstanding certificates are not necessarily the last certificates issued. Perhaps they may be the first certificates that were issued. Many of the persons who received these certificates in payment of honest debts due them for work and labor performed by them refused to convert them into 3.65 bonds, and have always insisted that they had an equitable claim for the full amount of the certificates in money. It may be, therefore, that you are denying to the holders of the most honest debts that privilege which the law gives them, when all those whose claims may be doubtful or which may have been tinctured with fraud were converted at once into 3.65 bonds.

Mr. KERNAN. Permit me to say that if there are men who have heretofore refused to take the 3.65 bonds and the certificates, they probably do not care for the certificates now, but prefer to stand on their rights. If they have an honest debt, they will get it; but if there be a certificate made yesterday for something that is not honest and not legal and bonds be given for it, there some honest man is cheated by taking those bonds or we do not do our duty. I think we should not issue any negotiable paper for any of these certificates which have not been converted into bonds before this time.

Mr. SHERMAN. The answer to that is the same answer that has been given by my colleague and the Senator from Indiana, who agreed in that, if in nothing else, that it was a pretty hard thing to require the creditor of the District to take a 3.65 bond. But the law did that. We said "We are willing to pay in 3.65 bonds, and will not give any more." Now you propose to refuse to give them the 3.65 bonds. What follows? The people who hold these certificates to the amount of a million of dollars have a plain, palpable right to demand the money of you, every dollar of it in full; and thus, by refusing to do what you have agreed to do, you make the burden more burdensome and compel us to pay the money.

Mr. KERNAN. It seems to me that if they have an honest debt against the District there ought to be provision to pay it. My objection is to issuing bonds, which may be issued for what is not an honest and legal debt, and yet the District and the people would have to pay it because there was a negotiable security issued for it. I am not familiar with this subject; but I have read this law, and I can find nothing in it by which certificates would be negotiable instruments. I do find that the board of audit may audit a claim and give a certificate, and the party at his election may take that. All he could ask would be that we should provide for his being paid what is justly due him.

Mr. MORTON. This amendment comes in now to wrong the Government. The first provision for 3.65 bonds was a wrong on the creditors of the Government, as I believe. These commissioners under this law were authorized to make contracts to carry out the contracts made by the board of public works. They have made such contracts; and the contractors knew that under the law they were to be paid in 3.65 bonds worth only sixty-five or seventy cents in the dollar. They made their bids accordingly, I doubt not. They were not prudent men if they did not make them accordingly. Now you propose to pay them not in 3.65 bonds, not at the rate of seventy cents on the dollar, but you propose now to pay them one hundred cents—to cut off the issue of 3.65 bonds and pay them at par in cash, because if you now cut off the power of issuing 3.65 bonds you have to pay these men in money, and pay them the face of the contract. So that it comes in in precisely the wrong place, I think.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, my motive was not to cut off, and I did not suppose it would touch the people who had done work and got certificates years ago. My object was to prevent 3.65 bonds going out for such cases as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] detailed to us yesterday, where there had been a contract by the board of public works to pave a square on Capitol Hill at the price of $8,000, and it had been extended to M street and to Fifteenth street, and

Mr. MORTON. One word. The effect of the Senator's amendment—and I call his attention to it directly—is to pay at par in cash upon contracts which were to be paid in bonds worth only sixty-nine or seventy cents on the dollar. It would thereby have the effect to make them exorbitant contracts.

Mr. STEVENSON. How could that be?

Mr. MORTON. How could that be? If a man makes his contract knowing that he is to be paid in a bond worth only sixty-nine cents on the dollar, he will put in his bid accordingly. Now you cut off the right to pay in bonds and pay him in cash, and you pay him 30 per cent. more than he expected to get. That is the effect precisely.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] His argument rather begs the question. He assumes that the commissioners in this District have not in creating this colossal debt exceeded the authority conferred upon them by this act. That is the very point in contest. During this entire debate the sole question has been, Did these commissioners in making these new improvements violate this law? Had they any power to create this debt of five millions over and above the estimate? If they have exceeded their authority, if they have violated the law, then comes the question, How far are their contracts in excess of law valid? By the construction insisted on by the commissioners, and defended by their friends in the Senate, there is no limitation on their power to create obligations, because there is no limit, says the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] to their power to contract for improvements. I utterly deny any such construction of this act to be valid. The pending bill, when it came from the House of Representatives, contained a proviso forbidding the issue of any of the 3.65 bonds beyond fifteen millions. The House deemed an investigation into the creation of this enormous debt by the commissioners a proper and legitimate subject-matter of inquiry, and hence their limitation upon the issue of these bonds beyond the amount named in the proviso.

But the Senate Committee on Appropriations struck out all that proviso. The Senate concurred with the amendment proposed by the committee, and the proviso has been stricken out.

I do not intend to be drawn into the debate, which has been so able and interesting, and which has taken so wide a scope. I am sure the country as well as the Senate will be astounded at some of the facts commented on by my distinguished friend from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in his argument. I rise only to express my cordial assent to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] It seems to me to be apposite, pertinent, and proper. The interest of the people of the entire country, and especially of this District, demands its adoption. Nobody can be injured by it. If the commissioners have wrongly construed this law, and contracted a debt of $5,000,000 more in improvements than they had authority to do, are we to stand still and allow the thing to go on? I cast no reflection on these commissioners. I will express no opinion upon their course until there is an investigation. But if they have erred in their construction of this act, if they have been wrongly advised, shall Congress stand still and allow such excess of unauthorized power to culminate in increased indebtedness without limitation and without investigation, because the commissioners are men of character? Shall we not stop the issue of illegal bonds at once, before they are negotiated and before they come into the hands of innocent parties for value? I think so. Every consideration of enlightened and just legislation demands the prompt adoption of this amendment.

I have no doubt in my own mind that this law has been violated. I speak with great deference, but I speak sincerely when I say that few courts of last resort in this broad land would, in my opinion, have construed this act as these commissioners have done. I confess my amazement when I hear distinguished Senators on this floor, lawyers of eminent and acknowledged ability, arguing that the commissioners, under the head of repairs as used in this act, might go on ad infinitum with new improvements and ad infinitum with incalculable obligations. Such a construction denies all limit to the power of these commissioners. The remedial character of the act in constituting this temporary government and putting a stop to the extravagance of the former government is utterly ignored by such a construction. If I am correctly informed, the commissioners gave no such construction to the act when they first came into power. On the contrary, they then believed that their power as to repairs was limited to the localities and streets and boundaries where improvements had actually been commenced, and did not extend to any boundary on the same street beyond the actual improvement contracted for. In support of this view I refer to a detailed statement of these commissioners made on 18th of February, 1875.

I have before me the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 3, part 2. On page 1295 I find that in a debate in the House of Representatives on the 15th of February, 1875, a detailed statement of items comprised under the heading of general fund on estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, from the comptroller's office in this District, dated February 13, 1875, and addressed to the commissioners, the estimate for repairs to wood pavement per estimate of the engineer, was $63,293.93, and repairs to concrete payment by the engineer's estimate was $45,918, making a total of $101,216.93 for repairs by engineer's estimate to both wooden and concrete pavements. The amount of 3.65 bonds was then estimated at $10,000,000, and yet with such estimates by the engineer for the District of Columbia of amounts required for repairs to these pavements, and which were made to the commissioners and cited in Congress, I am informed that these commissioners have, under the power to repair and preserve, extended these wooden and concrete pavements to streets for squares and squares where no improvement had been commenced, and instead of an outlay of $109,219.93, as estimated for, they have expended, as I am told, nine hundred and seventy-odd thousand dollars for wooden and concrete pavements alone; and instead of ten million of 3.65 bonds we have now a debt of fifteen million; and if the construction of this act insisted upon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] as the true one, these commissioners can go on without limitation and make the debt twenty million. Sir, a limitation ought at once to be placed on this power of the commissioners; a thorough investigation ought to be had into all this expenditure. It can injure nobody. The high character of these commissioners is no guarantee against error.

I have not and I will not impeach their motives until I have seen their whole administration investigated, but if these commissioners were ten times as exalted in private life as they are, they still are subordinate to the law of the land, to its limitations, and to its restrictions. I believe they have erred in the exercise of power, and in the creation of a debt of millions not authorized by the letter or spirit of the law which created them. It will not do for Senators to attempt to sustain these commissioners in a wrong construction of any act of Congress by which a debt of millions of dollars is saddled upon the people by telling us of their worth and high character. O, no, sir; no! The highest as well as the lowest in this land must become servants of the law. Without it there is no popular safety.

Mr. President, if George Washington himself could rise from the grave he would delight to be and he should be subordinate in every official action to the requirements of the law. I will not say a word against these gentlemen except to say what I believe, that their action is not justified by the law. I believe that they have exercised powers and created debts that Congress did not contemplate and which no just and valid construction of the statute creating the commission authorized.

Our feelings should never allow any of us to forget that this is a government of law. Grant to these commissioners all the high qualities that their friends claim, both in public and private, it can confer upon them no valid authority to contract a debt not authorized by law. It can never authorize any construction of a statute which its language, context, subject-matter, and intendment clearly forbid. Honest men often err; dishonest ones more frequently. St. Paul's sincerity in his bloody mission to Damascus was never questioned; but in his own eyes it did not lessen or diminish his error.

It is our duty to check the error, whether honest or dishonest, and to check an illegitimate and unauthorized increase of the public debt. I say that we should go further, and investigate this alarming and extraordinary increase of this the public debt. No cry of danger to the public credit will make me hesitate by my vote to forbid the issue of another bond until the limitation proposed by this amendment is placed upon the power of these commissioners. In addition, I hope an investigation will be speedily had, and let the country be enlightened as to what contracts were valid and what were invalid, and to ascertain what is the legitimate indebtedness of the Government of the United States for improvements in this District. Gent emen cannot frighten me by talking about protests of government bonds. The commissioners should themselves rejoice in such an investigation. The speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] and that of the Senator from Delaware will and should arouse the country. We have heard enough and seen enough to demand, as it seems to me, of every Senator to forbid the issue of another bond until a thorough and full scrutiny into all those transactions has taken place. After all that has been said in this debate it is just to the commissioners, it is just to ourselves, and it is just to the country. For my own part, if mine was the only vote I would go for the limitation proposed by this amendment, and I am quite sure this bill will never become and never should become a law without so just and salutary a restraint.

Mr. MCDONALD. Mr. President, the objection which my colleague takes to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is that it will cut off converting certificates that have been issued under contracts made since the passage of the law authorizing the issuance of these new bonds. Now, as many Senators believe that these commissioners had no authority to make such contracts, that the act c eating this commission conferred no such authority, it seems to me that it is right and proper that we should stop at this point and investigate that question before we pass these certificates into the form of negotiable securities.

But the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] insists that this will cut off the conversions of the old certificates which are held by parties who have declined to avail themselves of the provisions of this act. If there is that class, (and it seems that the friends of the commission do not exactly agree in regard to the character of these outstanding certificates,) as has been well remarked their claim cannot be prejudiced. They have not availed themselves of this privilege thus far; and it is not to be presumed that they propose to rush in now and take these bonds in lieu of an indebtedness which they regard as good to them dollar for dollar.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Do I understand that the amendment of the Senator from California has been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That limits the amount to $15,000,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understands.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That limits the amount of bonds and certificates to $15,000,000, and the amendment of the Senator from New York says that there shall be no further issue of bonds.

Mr. KERNAN. If the Senator will allow me, I moved that as an amendment, striking out the proviso of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and substituting mine.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that, if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York, the law will be in the right condition. It gives the right then to issue fifteen millions, and that is what we all want to limit it to.

Mr. SARGENT. No; it would be entirely inconsistent with the amendment which has been adopted. It would be, impossible I think, for anybody to construe them together.

Mr. KERNAN. My motion is offered as a substitute for the proviso offered by the Senator from Iowa, which is:

Provided, That any issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited.

I move to perfect the amendment pending by striking that out and substituting what was read forbidding any further issue.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion for two or three days, and heard quite a number of Senators arguing that the issue of these bonds amounting to nearly $5,000,000 was clearly in violation of the law. I presume that, if this amendment should be adopted prohibiting any further issue and after that bonds should be issued, that issue would be clearly in violation of the law. Now, I should like to inquire of some of the Senators who have made that character of argument whether they would afterward, if this prohibition is fixed upon the bill and bonds be issued by these commissioners exceeding that amount, vote then that the Government should pay those bonds next session because they had been issued? I would like the Senator from Iowa to answer me that question, or the Senator from Massachusetts, whether he thinks there would be any obligation on the Senate, if that provision was fixed in the law and bonds should be issued afterward, to vote to pay them.

Mr. DAWES. I will answer the Senator. I would indict the officials.

Mr. LOGAN. If you would indict the officials you would propose that the Government pay. I merely want an answer. Would you advocate the payment of bonds issued contrary to a prohibition fixed upon this bill in reference to the amount? There would be nothing except that it would be invalid because the law made a limit.

Mr. DAWES. The distinction between that case and the existing one is this: According to the construction put upon the law at present by those who are clothed with the execution of it, there is no limitation upon the amount. The complaint I made yesterday was that they had put that construction upon it. They are upheld in this Chamber by very able lawyers. They go to work in good faith. They believe in that construction. They have been led into that construction. We find them putting a construction upon the law which we do not believe to be sound. We take away that discretion absolutely by an express enactment. From that hour if they issue a dollar of bonds they issue it in absolute fraud, as much as if they manufactured a similitude of an existing bond, as much as if they sat down and made a 5.20 bond and put it upon the market; and if we could detect them in that we would send them to the penitentiary, and if we could detect one of the bonds they made we would treat it as we would a counterfeit of a 5.20 or a counterfeit of a greenback.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wished to get at something that would satisfy my mind about this matter. I must confess that I am very much confused in reference to this question by the debate. When I know that a bond has been illegally issued I do not believe it ought to be paid. The illegal issue of these bonds, if they are illegal and if the law has been violated, is just as much a violation of the law as if this prohibition had been in the law before, and they issued the bonds in violation of it. How Senators can argue on this floor that these bonds had been issued without any authority whatever, and then turn around and vote for the Government paying them, and then ask for a prohibition to prevent other bonds being issued, is something I cannot get through my brain; and I must confess it is merely that cloud which is on my mind that I desire to remove. I do not believe in making the Government responsible year after year for violations of law. We have heard this thing in this Chamber for years.

I tried to find out yesterday, not by questions put in open Senate but by asking Senators, how much had been expended for the benefit of the city of Washington by the action of Congress since 1870. I cannot tell; I cannot find out; no one knows; Senators stand up and tell us that the law has been violated by issues amounting to millions of dollars and at the same time they tell us that they are in haste for the Government to pay them. I cannot understand it I must confess. I know I always opposed the organization of the late government in Washington; I opposed the spending of money by the Government for the beautifying of streets here except around the Government property. I said at the time it was done that the Government would finally pay at least $30,000,000, and I have been trying to ascertain if they have not paid that much. I am satisfied that they have paid over $15,000,000 already, because we have that right before us, besides the amount of assessment that has been made and taxes collected. If the Government is responsible for it I have nothing to say; but I merely wish to give my reasons for not being a party to it. If these commissioners had no authority to issue these bonds Congress should have stopped them and Congress should not pay them. You put a prohibition on and they violate it. It is no more a violation of the law than you already have right here before you.

I want Senators who have argued that this was a violation of law, a monstrosity, an outrage against everything, a violation of the law as understood by the Senate when they passed it, and all that, to reconcile that with their votes. That is all I rose to say.

I desire that this matter should go over. I shall move that the Senate do now adjourn, and, if the motion be carried, to-morrow morning I desire to move that this whole matter be referred to a committee for examination. If what Senators have said here in the Senate is true, then there ought to be an examination, and a thorough one. It does not injure the public credit to see whether the public securities are honest securities or dishonest. If they are dishonest securities, they ought not to be paid; if they are honest, they ought to be paid. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw his motion to adjourn, in order to allow me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We do not want to do either yet.

Mr. EATON. I will modify my motion and move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 32, noes 19.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Withers—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bruce, Burnside, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, English, Gordon, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Patterson, Thurman, and Whyte—14.

So the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate bills from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the Military Academy at West Point for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 26) to remove the political disabilities of Francis T. Nichols, of Louisiana, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

DEATH OF SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. EATON. I desire to state that owing to the absence of one of my colleagues in the other House, who has gone to Connecticut to attend the funeral of the late Mr. Starkweather, I shall not present resolutions upon the death of my late colleague, in the Senate, to-morrow, but will reserve them for a future day.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty-eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and eight minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 1, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

The Clerk began the reading of the Journal; but before concluding,

Mr. HURLBUT said: I desire to inquire if the Clerk is reading the Journal as actually made up? I notice that in reading he merely gives the name of the member introducing the bill and the number of the bill, but neither the title nor the committee to which it is referred.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] that the Clerk is not reading the Journal as actually made up, but is abbreviating the respective entries by giving the numbers of the bills and the names of the members introducing them. That is a custom which has been very often followed by previous Clerks of this House. Does the gentleman object to the present Clerk continuing the practice? It is often very desirable when the Journal is very long, as it is this morning.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not, provided the record is made up so as to show the actual proceedings of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct that the Journal be read in full, if the gentleman asks that it be done.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not ask that the Journal be read in full. I only desire to ascertain whether, as actually made up, it is a full record. I do not desire to have the time of the House taken up by having it read in full.

The SPEAKER. The Journal is very full; in the usual form.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the Journal, and it was then approved as correct.

TROUBLE ON TEXAS BORDER.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a letter of inquiry from the Select Committee on the Texan Frontier Troubles, correspondence in relation to troubles on the Rio Grande border; which was referred to the Committee on the Texan Frontier Troubles.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA AFFAIRS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the commissioners of the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 6th instant, the information therein asked for; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House letters from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting claims of certain persons for Indian depredations; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

TONKAWA INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution of the 20th instant, papers touching the number and condition of the Tonkawa Indians at Fort Griffin, Texas; which was refered to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL M. C. MEIGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to House resolution of the 25th instant, copies of the orders and instructions under which Quartermaster-General M. C. Meigs is traveling abroad; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MIAMI INDIANS OF KANSAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, upon the subject of the consolidation of the Miami Indians of Kansas with the confederated bands of Peoria, Piankeshaw, Kaskaskia, and Wea Indians in the Indian Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PATENT OFFICE REPORT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of Patents, transmitting the annual report of the Patent Office; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

WINNEBAGO AND POTTAWATOMIE INDIANS IN WISCONSIN.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of the 6th instant, an account of the disbursements from the appropriations for the care of stray bands of Winnebago and Pottawatomie Indians in Wisconsin, prior to the year 1871; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

SAN JACINTO RIVER AND GALVESTON SHIP-CANAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers on the ship-canal between the mouth of San Jacinto River and Bolivar channel, Galveston Harbor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

DEPOSITS OF MONEY WITH ARMY PAYMASTERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Colonel Andrews and other officers of the Army, relative to legislation providing for making deposits of money with paymasters; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

STEAM-VESSELS OF WAR.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, transmitting, in response to a House resolution of the 5th instant, a communication from the Chief of the Bureau of Construction, relative to the cost of constructing eight steam-vessels of war; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDIO MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, reporting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, that no objection exists to the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 322) providing for relinquishing to the city and county of San Francisco a portion of the Presidio military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 34) to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the land district.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the following title:

An act (H. R. No. 785) to extend the time for stamping unstamped instruments.

DEPOSITS OF MONEY WITH ARMY PAYMASTERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a petition of Blair D. Taylor and others, for legislation to enable Army officers to make deposits of money with paymasters; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FORT BUTLER MILITARY RESERVATION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to an inquiry of the Committee on Military Affairs dated the 21st instant, relative to the Fort Butler military reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FUNDS TO BE COVERED INTO THE TREASURY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Indian commissioners, inclosing draught of a bill providing for covering into the Treasury certain funds therein named; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

ENLISTED MEN EMPLOYED IN WASHINGTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with House resolution of the 19th ultimo, a statement of the enlisted men employed in Washington, in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

JURISDICTION OVER INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, presenting the draught of a bill in relation to jurisdiction over Indians in certain States named therein; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

RED CLOUD AGENCY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, on the subject of supplies required at the Red Cloud agency; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT PROPERTY AT HARPER'S FERRY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the sale of United States property at Harper's Ferry, in the State of West Virginia, in November and December of the year 1869; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PIKESVILLE ARSENAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the draught of a bill for the sale of Pikesville arsenal, in the State of Maryland; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

FREEDMAN'S SAVINGS AND TRUST COMPANY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, responding to resolution of the House of January 24, 1876, asking for information relative to the transactions of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company; which was referred to the Select Committee on the Freedmen's Banks, and ordered to be printed.

SEAL VS. LYNCH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House papers in the contested-election case of Seal vs. Lynch, sixth congressional district State of Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

TONKAWA INDIANS, TEXAS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting information in relation to the Tonkawa Indians in Texas, called for by House resolution of January 20, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

HOMESTEAD ENTRIES WITHIN RAILROAD GRANTS.

Mr. CROUNSE. Mr. Speaker, I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill No. 34 to confirm pre-emption and homestead entries of public lands within the limits of railroad grants in cases where such entries have been made under the regulations of the Land Department for reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE S. HAWKINS.

Mr. COX. I move by unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida, in order that it may be put on its passage at this time. I filed his petition asking for the removal of his political disabilities with the Committee on the Judiciary, and this bill has already passed the Senate.

There was no objection, and the bill was taken from the Speaker's table and read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that all political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the rebellion be removed from George S. Hawkins, of the State of Florida.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and being read the third time, it was passed, (two-thirds of the House concurring therein.)

Mr. COX moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at ten minutes before one o'clock, and committees will be called for reports of a public nature.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. I ask unanimous consent to take up a Senate bill for reference.

Several MEMBERS objected, and called for the regular order of business.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 687) to amend chapter 7 of title 34 of the Revised United States Statutes; and the same was laid upon the table.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee on Claims have examined the bill (H. R. No. 979) for the relief of Ella P. Murphy, widow of Patrick Murphy, deceased, and have directed me to report it back to the House as having been improperly referred, and to move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, at the request of the claimant.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Committee on Claims have also directed me to report back the following bills and memorials as improperly referred, and to move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that they be referred to the Committee on War Claims:

The bill (H. R. No. 68) for the relief of Louis Pelham;

The bill (H. R. No. 1391) for the relief of James Glover, of Pennsylvania;

The petition of Josiah Cunningham, for relief;

The petition of Pryor N. Lea, of Washington County, Arkansas, for relief;

The petition of G. Alfred Hall, for relief;

The memorial of John S. Harper and others, claim for prize-money on cotton captured at sea during the rebellion;

The memorial of Lieutenant Julius M. Carrington, claim for services as lieutenant United States Army in 1863-'64; and

The memorial of James and William Vance, for rent of barracks in San Antonio, in 1865.

The motion was agreed to, and the bills and memorials were referred to the Committee on War Claims.

HEIRS OF JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 101) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM H. NESSLE.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Claims, reported back, with the recommendation that the same do pass with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William H. Nessle; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HAWAIIAN BARK ARCTIC.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1796) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian bark Arctic; which was read a first and second time.

The question was on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to issue an American register to the Hawaiian bark Arctic, owed by Charles Brewer & Co., of Boston, Massachusetts.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I take it for granted that this bill is reported with a view to ascertaining the sense of the House in reference to granting American registers to foreign-built vessels. This vessel, I presume, was built at a foreign port, and the only ground on which it is sought to grant it an American registry is that it is now owned by citizens of the United States. Will the gentleman who reports the bill inform me on that point; whether that is the state of facts in this case?

Mr. PIERCE. I request that the report of the committee accompanying the bill be read for the information of the House.

The report was read, as follows:

On the petition of Charles Brewer & Co., of Boston, that an American register be granted to the Hawaiian bark Arctic, owned by said firm, the following report is submitted:

It appears that the bark was built at Rochester, Massachusetts, in 1850; was purchased by Messrs. Brewer & Co. in 1861, and was used by them in carrying, from New Bedford and Boston to Honolulu, supplies for the American whaling fleet in the North Pacific. This was a highly important service, and any interruption of it would have caused a serious injury to American interests. In 1863 it was found necessary, in order to prevent the capture and destruction of the vessel by rebel cruisers which then infested the Pacific Ocean, to place her under the Hawaiian flag; and that was accordingly done, although the service and the ownership continued unchanged. It is evident from what took place immediately after the transfer to a foreign flag that the vessel would have been captured if the transfer had not been made, thereby depriving the whalers of supplies necessary to the continued pursuit of their vocation. The vessel continued in this business until 1869, when she was fitted at New Bedford as a whale-ship, and from that time to the present has been engaged in the whale-fishery, refitting from time to time at Honolulu and shipping her catch of oil and bone to New Bedford. Being under a foreign flag, although owned and commanded by American citizens, her oil is subject to a duty of 20 per cent. ad valorem, and she cannot enter an American port without being subject to tonnage-dues. The owners, therefore, labor under a serious disadvantage in carrying on their business; and, considering the circumstances which forced them to seek protection under another flag, they feel justified in asking the Government to cure the disability under which they labor by the grant of an American register.

This briefly stated, is the case presented by the petitioners.

We will now refer to the law bearing upon the subject, and the action of the Government in similar cases.

In 1866 an act was passed (United States Statutes, volume 14, page 3) providing that no ship or vessel which had been recorded or registered as an American vessel pursuant to law, and which should have been licensed or otherwise authorized to sail under a foreign flag, and to have the protection of any foreign government during the existence of the rebellion, should be deemed or registered as an American vessel, or should have the right and privileges of American vessels except under the provisions of an act of Congress authorizing such registry.

The substance of this provision was incorporated into the Revised Statutes, section 4135. It appears, then, that the matter is specially confided to the discretion of Congress to determine each case, as presented, upon its own merits, just the same as the changing of the name of a vessel.

In the first session of the Forty-third Congress, an act was passed (chapter 145) authorizing an American register to be issued to the bark Azor, an American-built vessel employed as a packet between the island of Fayal and the United States, which had been transferred to a British subject in 1863, and after the war retransferred to the heirs of Charles W. Dabney, late consul of the United States at Fayal. It appears from the facts set forth in the petition in that case that the circumstances under which the transfer was made were almost the same as those under which the Arctic was transferred. The Azor was at that time the only vessel sailing regularly between the United States and the island of Fayal, and afforded the only means of communication between these places. The liability to capture by rebel cruisers was so great that the premium of insurance demanded amounted to a substantial prohibition. On this statement of facts there appears to have been no hesitation on the part of the Committee on Commerce in recommending, or on the part of Congress in affording, the relief applied for.

There have been several cases in which registers have been granted to ships transferred during the rebellion, and in which there appear to have been no special claims for consideration.

By resolution No. 70, (second session, Forty-second Congress,) American registers were granted to the British bark Live Oak, owned by citizens of New Bedford, and the Agra, owned by Thomas B. Wales & Co., of Boston. These vessels had been placed under the British flag during the rebellion.

In the first session, Forty-third Congress, the Canadian schooner George Warren (Chapter 56) and the British ship Alhambra (Chapter 408) were granted American registers. The Alhambra was built in Boston in 1859, surrendered her register at

New York in 1863, and was placed under a foreign flag for safety. It does not appear that she was engaged in any service of special value to the Government or to American interests.

In reply to a request addressed to the Treasury Department for information upon the subject, the Secretary states, in a communication of the 17th January, that applications for American registers in cases similar to these had not been numerous, and that the policy of the Department had been against the return of such vessels to the flag of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury who held office in 1870, having been asked by the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of that year as to the expediency of granting an American register to the Alhambra, advised against it; but Congress nevertheless granted the register.

Considering the special claims which Messrs. Brewer & Co. have for favorable action in their case, the precedents already established, and the fact that the lapse of time since the rebellion precludes many applications of a similar character, it is recommended that the prayer of petitioners be granted, and that the accompanying bill be passed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. There is a principle of some magnitude, in my judgment, involved in this proposition, and if the House will bear with me a few minutes I think I may be able to state what the case is as presented by the report, which I had not heard before it was read just now from the desk.

It will be recollected that during our late civil war an effort was made by a great many ship-owners in the country to avoid the dangers of the ocean to their vessels and cargoes by denationalizing themselves. And I have often thought, sir, that one of the great reasons why the United States has lost its navigation, its carrying trade, that we had in a superior degree to any other maritime nation in the world before the war——

Mr. KASSON. Except Great Britain.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Was because our ship-owners endeavored to avoid the dangers of the ocean by changing the flag and sailing under the protection of foreign governments. Thus our tonnage fell down in less than three years to a minimum of only 20 per cent. of what it had stood at previous to the rebellion.

Now the question presented in the bill under consideration is this: whether, after the passage of a law by Congress that in every case where a vessel had changed its flag, had placed itself under the protection of a foreign government, and had endeavored to avoid the consequences of a condition of revolution in this country by escaping from the responsibilities and liabilities and consequences of the rebellion, it should be restored, as it could have been under the law as it stood previous to the rebellion.

In this case presented by my honorable friend from Boston it appears that this vessel, owned in Boston, had been a whaler and was, in the course of business, necessarily in the Pacific Ocean, which we know was infested with rebel cruisers and privateers. To escape from liability to capture she comes under the Hawaiian government flag. She sails under that flag. She is under the protection of that flag. In short, she denationalizes herself. As if, sir, you or I should go to Europe to escape a calamity of any kind in our own country, and should absolve ourselves from all allegiance to the Constitution and Government of the United States and seek the protection of a foreign government, virtually becoming, not an American, but a foreign citizen. How far we can, in the first place, absolve ourselves from our own natural allegiance, and how far we may be entitled to the protection of a foreign government afterward, is a question which has been discussed here very often, and is not yet adequately settled between the governments of Europe and that of the United States. But in this case, the question now presented is whether, having no longer any danger from capture, the owners in Boston shall be allowed to resume the protection of our Government and get rid of the duties imposed on their cargoes in consequence of sailing under a foreign flag; whether a vessel shall be returned again to an American register and become in fact entirely an American vessel. Being owned at Boston and sailed by Americans under the Hawaiian flag, the question is whether we shall grant this vessel what is sought in the bill before the House.

So far as the mere question now before the House is concerned, I have no particular concern or interest; but I do insist upon it that those upon the ocean, as well as upon the land, shall take their just responsibility of that terrible condition of things so disastrous to life and property and public and private liberty in the United States, as was the case in the civil war; and I can only say that, if Boston, loyal Boston, endeavors to escape from her just proportion of that calamity, it is an example set to other portions of the Union that probably did not claim to be so loyal as Boston claimed to be.

Mr. PIERCE. I desire to say to my friend from New York that the general question whether vessels which were placed under foreign flags during the rebellion shall be returned to our flag is not involved in this bill, and was not considered by the committee. This is a special case, and there are special reasons why the request of the petitioners should be granted. The whaling business is a peculiar business; it is concentrated at the port of New Bedford to the exclusion of all other ports in the world. That is the only place in this country where any whaling business is carried on to any extent. Now, sir, this vessel was employed from 1861 during the rebellion in carrying supplies to our whalers in the Northern Pacific. The supplies which those vessels require are peculiar and special. They can only be obtained at New Bedford. They cannot be obtained at any other port or city of this country. It was essential to the prosperity and success of the whaling fleet that these supplies should be regularly furnished to them, and they could be furnished only from New Bedford. This vessel was employed in carrying those supplies and in no other way. She was not engaged in the whaling business at that time. She had to pass directly across the track of the rebel cruisers. The result shows that if she had not been put under the Hawaiian flag she would have been destroyed, and these supplies could not have been carried to the whaling fleet, and the fleet would have been seriously restricted in its operations.

The general question, I say to my friend from New York, is not involved at all, and was not considered.

Congress has once before granted a similar request under precisely the same circumstances. There was a vessel, the bark Azor, plying between Boston and Fayal, directly in the track of the rebel cruisers, and it was deemed important that that communication should be kept open. The risk had become so great that the insurance companies would not insure except at enormous rates, which amounted to practical prohibition, and therefore the vessel had to be placed under a foreign flag. Congress for that special reason, believing that the vessel had done a valuable service to the country and that under the circumstances it was right that she should be transferred to a foreign flag, subsequently granted the request of the owners to return to our flag. Precisely the same necessity existed in this case.

Mr. HEREFORD. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I was a little surprised at the position taken by my friend from New York, [Mr. WOOD.] I had thought that this side of the House—even putting it as broadly as the gentleman from New York has placed it—that this side of the House was in favor of general amnesty. I do not put this case exactly upon those terms, as the report will not justify it, but I put it on the broadest terms that the owners of vessels did who did desire to shield themselves from this responsibility to confederate cruisers. Supposing even that they were confederate, yet if they come back here now at this time and ask amnesty for the past, I am equally willing to grant amnesty to a vessel from the city of Boston, as I am and have always been in favor of granting universal amnesty to every man throughout the length and breadth of the land; so that I do not see that this is a proper objection, especially in this centennial year.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I submit to the gentleman's argument, and will withdraw all objection.

Mr. HEREFORD. I do not think that in this centennial year we should be punishing vessels or the owners of vessels for their participation in the late unpleasantness.

There is one additional remark that I desire to make. I shall not take up the time of the House to discuss this question at any length. I simply throw out one idea, and no one is responsible for my views but myself.

So far as I am concerned, I see no good reason why, if we desire to increase the carrying trade of the United States, to improve our commerce and to bring our tonnage back to where it was before the war—I see no good reason why any person may not be allowed to buy a vessel anywhere in any country and bring it here, and if it belongs to an American citizen, if it is owned by an American citizen, then let it be registered as an American vessel. So far as I am concerned, I would that all the vessels which changed their registration from that of the United States to that of foreign countries, by which, as my friend from New York [Mr. WOOD] says, we lost the carrying trade, should all come back. If we lost the carrying trade in that way, and if it should come back under American registration, then as a matter of course it will to that extent bring back the carrying trade to the United States again. I can see no good reason why this bill should not pass, even upon the broadest grounds that the gentleman has indicated. As a matter of fact, however, the report says that this is an exceptional case, and the vessel should be allowed to come back again under American registration.

Mr. CONGER. I desire, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. KASSON. I believe the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] yields to me.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the Chair to recognize me.

Mr. PIERCE. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. CONGER. I understood that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. HEREFORD] had taken the floor in his own right.

The SPEAKER. That was the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. HEREFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] had the floor, having reported the bill.

Mr. PIERCE. I will first yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] and then to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. KASSON. I desire to hold the floor but a few minutes. I recollect very well the circumstances under which the bill passed which is affected by this exceptional proposition. I remember, too, that I was one of those who opposed the entire policy of that bill. I should be glad to remind the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] of the purpose avowed at the time that bill was passed, and the mistaken theory upon which it was adopted. It was thought that the effect would be to exclude these vessels from the American carrying trade, and produce a revival of ship-building in certain ship-yards in the United States. The bill entirely failed in this purpose, and in my judgment was itself one of the most significant causes of that failure.

I was then shocked by the proposition, because it prevented our own citizens from engaging American bottoms in the carrying trade of the United States, and put them upon the same footing as the owners of foreign bottoms. I had supposed that when a proposition was made to this House to repeal that bill entirely from the statute-book, it would not find more than one-fourth, if that number, of the members to oppose it. Our tonnage is to-day diminished by thousands and hundreds of thousands of tons because that law has stood as long as it has. My only complaint of the Committee of Commerce—and I am glad to hear the chairman of that committee [Mr. HEREFORD] say that he concurs with me in opinion—is that they have not long since reported a bill to repeal that section of the Revised Statutes.

Look for a moment at the cause of the exclusion imposed by that law. We had not the Navy to protect our ships on the seas. We could not send a convoy for any one or any ten ships we had afloat. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] remembers well the paucity of our Navy at the time these changes occurred and the impossibility of sending a convoy for our trading vessels. Yet when our people sought to save to themselves, and in doing so to save to the country the wealth that was invested in their vessels and which was in danger of being sent to the bottom of the sea by rebel cruisers, it was proposed to punish them for having thus saved from destruction by the national enemy this wealth of the country. Do gentlemen on that side or on this side of the House contend to-day that the punishment shall be continued; that when they propose to restore this wealth to the United States we shall prohibit them from doing so?

Sir, I do not understand the ground of opposition to this bill. Did these men commit a wrong to the United States when they protected their own property in the only way possible to them, in the only way that was open to them? If these vessels had remained under our flag and had been sent to the bottom of the sea by hostile cruisers, as so many other vessels were, of what advantage would it have been to the United States? I repeat, it is impossible to understand the justification of the opposition to such legislation as this. If we ever expect to revive our commerce, to restore the prosperity of our flag, and to regain the profits that come from the carrying trade of this country, we must liberalize our legislation far beyond the proposition involved in this bill, and even beyond the proposition to repeal wholly this exclusive law.

I hope to see the day when any American citizen may buy ships wherever he can get them cheapest, and be allowed to register and sail them under our flag. Let this right of purchase exist for at least a limited time, say two or three years, so as to restore our men to the habits of the sea and our merchants to a knowledge of the commerce of the world, and then, if you please, you may restore the protective principle and require all future registered bottoms to be built in this country. But when our ship-yards have been silent for years, when the sound of the hammer is scarcely heard in them, do members on this floor still contend that it is necessary to protect the interests of American ship-building that we should positively prohibit these vessels which were built in America from coming under the American flag again? Certainly the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] does not propose to build up our commerce on that theory in the face of historical fact.

So far as this single proposition is concerned, I support it only because it is a step in the right direction. I hope that the Committee on Commerce will do for all ship-owners in the same situation what this bill proposes to do for one.

Mr. PIERCE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, this is one of several hundred cases of like character which have been presented to Congress within the last eight or ten years, and with the exception of the three cases mentioned in the report no one of all the hundreds of applications made for the granting of American registry to vessels that had sought the protection of other governments during the war has received the favorable action of Congress.

It is with no little regret that I find the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, [Mr. HEREFORD,] to whose especial care the navigation interests, the ship-building interests, the commerce of the United States are given in charge, should be so influenced by any consideration connected with amnesty or the Centennial or any other general measure of that kind as to declare himself in favor of a restoration to American registry of all that class of old ships that went out from our nationality during the war and have sought at this later day to regain the privileges of American ships.

Here, Mr. Speaker, let me remind the House of the character of the three cases referred to in the report, and the only three cases within my knowledge in which an American registry has been granted, while the records of the Committee on Commerce will show it has been refused within the last six years in hundreds of other cases. The first is the case of the Azor, the only vessel, as the report states, that had communication at the time between the island of Fayal and the United States; the only vessel that could bear the orders of our Government to the American officers stationed there. That vessel did seek the protection of another flag, and was afterward restored to an American registry, but not until it was shown to the Committee on Commerce that the vessel was the special object of the vengeance of a confederate vessel; that it was pursued upon the high seas, one object being to secure dispatches sent upon it; that it was in the interest of the United States as well as the owners of the vessel, and by the consent of the American authorities, that it did seek a foreign flag. For that reason, and that reason alone, a favorable report was made in the case of the Azor.

Another case was that of the Geo. Warren, a little coasting schooner for pleasure parties among the Thousand Islands of the Saint Lawrence, and for carrying provisions and furniture to citizens enjoying their summers on the different islands there. It was owned by an American, used by Americans and for American purposes. It was a little craft, so diminutive that it was of no consequence whether the registry was given or not, and for mere convenience an American registry was granted.

The other case was that of the Alhambra. If I remember aright, that vessel was rebuilt by an American owner to the extent of more than three-fourths its value, for it had been partially shipwrecked on the Pacific. The circumstances were such that if it had met with its injuries on the American coast, an American registry, after the rebuilding, could have been given by the Secretary of the Treasury without any application to Congress at all. Having received its injuries on the high seas, and having been rebuilt, as the law contemplates, to the extent of three-fourths of its value by American workmen, an American registry was granted in that case. This, if I remember rightly, completes the entire list.

In the case now before the House the vessel is eighteen or nineteen years old—an old craft. To-day, Mr. Speaker, the ship-yards of America, both of our Atlantic coast and on the great lakes, are silent as the grave. The thousands of men who have learned by long years of labor and practice to build American ships have been driven from our ship-yards, and are now securing other employment, because old crafts that have been sailing under foreign flags are doing the work that should be done by American vessels. Old crafts are sought to be restored to carry on that work upon the seas.

I do not wonder that my friend from the prairie region of Illinois, where they sail in large wagons, is a free-trader. The world knows that my friend is a free-trader. He never has been guilty, so far as I remember, of casting his vote in any manner for the protection of any American industry, but is for free trade in lumber, in salt, in ships, and in all products that can be brought from other countries. He may well commend himself to my democratic brethren on the other side of the House who are free traders. I should also expect my other friend from Illinois to be in favor of free ships. That was part of the theory of some gentlemen in this House in former days, and may be now. But that the Committee on Commerce, who have in charge especially the protection of ship-building and our navigation interests and our general commerce, should favor a policy which will allow these old worn-out ships to take the place of good new ships which our workmen are standing ready to build, anxious for the opportunity to labor, is a matter of surprise to me.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the theory of having free ships is not involved in this bill. The question is as to the propriety of allowing any man from Boston or from the Carolinas or elsewhere to use his ship in safety during the war under another flag, and that the flag of a little obscure island in the Pacific, and then come to Congress to have the old carcass restored to American registry. That such a proposition should meet with favor here surprises me.

Mr. PIERCE. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WOOD.]

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say but a word in reply to the gentleman [Mr. CONGER] who has last spoken and who has seen proper to introduce the question of tariff in connection with the simple proposition to change the nationality of a vessel. Sir, the ship-yards of this country are without employment because it has suited that gentleman's political friends to lay such a protective tariff upon everything entering into the construction of vessels that it is impossible to build them and place them on the ocean under the American flag without the loss of money.

If we could construct vessels as we do houses without paying subsidies to certain manufacturers in this country, then, sir, I believe the American flag would once more float upon the ocean, and American trade would be carried in American bottoms. But so long as every element entering into the construction and fitting out of vessels, copper, iron, bolts, sheathing, and every other article as well as furniture, is made to pay bounty to individuals in our country, just so long will our ship-yards be empty, silent, and without occupation.

In reply to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I desire to say that I am an advocate of free ships. I always have been in favor of free trade, for I believe the industries of this country can stand up successfully in competition with the industries of any other country. For one I will not admit that American enterprise, American energy, American industry, American capital can anywhere be surpassed by that of any other land. I am glad, therefore, to hear that gentleman say he is in favor of the admission of ships wherever constructed into the ports of the United States free. But this is not the question here at this time. It is whether we will permit a vessel to be denationalized at the convenience of its owner for his safety and profit purely. I do not rise to oppose this bill, for so far as this individual case is concerned I make no opposition to it. My remarks were directed to the general question and not this particular case.

Mr. PIERCE. I now yield for five minutes to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I concur in opinion with the chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. HEREFORD] and the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that the policy of excluding these ships from the resumption of American registers is not a wise one. I do not rise, however, for the purpose of enforcing that view of the matter, but merely to state that the committee in favoring this measure was influenced by the exceptional circumstances surrounding the surrender of the American register in this case. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has called attention to two cases in which American registers were restored to vessels on account of like exceptional circumstances attending their surrender. The report of the committee in this case states facts showing exceptional circumstances. Let us see what they are.

The New Bedford Whale Fishing Company had a fleet of vessels in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean. It was necessary for them to communicate with that fleet, and to furnish it with requisite supplies. As the gentleman from Massachusetts has already told the House, it was the only whaling fleet then doing business of that kind in those waters. In order to reach a station upon the Pacific from which to supply this whaling fleet this vessel had twice to cross the equator and undergo the dangers then incident to American shipping because of the existing war. Liability to capture, under the circumstances, was very considerable, if the vessel retained its American register. Indeed, under the circumstances, its capture was almost inevitable, and if captured, that whaling fleet in the North Pacific would be cut off from the supplies essential to its success. It was not a vessel simply trading in any general business, or in any regular line of commerce, but a vessel carrying out supplies to an American fleet engaged in the whale fishery in the waters of the North Pacific Ocean. Therefore it was in the interest of that fleet that this vessel's American register was surrendered. It was for the purpose of taking out absolutely necessary supplies to this large fleet that her American register was surrendered. This makes the case an exceptional one, justifying a departure from the principle established, if the principle itself be a correct one, and such was the view taken by the Committee on Commerce. It was not the intention of the Committee on Commerce, as the report shows, to raise the question as to the policy of allowing all vessels to resume American registers when they have once been surrendered. It is allowed to be done in this case upon the ground, as I have said, of exceptional circumstances and equities created by the necessity of supplies being furnished to those in whose service she was employed. I will only say in addition that I do not know how we are to promote American shipping and ship-building interests by refusing to allow vessels in this condition to resume their American registers. I do not propose, however, to go into that general question at this time.

Mr. PIERCE. I now demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SALE OF INDIAN LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. GOODIN, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 163) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands, in Kansas, to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute and a recommendation that the bill, as amended, be passed.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the substitute alone will be read.

There was no objection.

The substitute (H. R. No. 1797) was read, as follows:

A bill providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands, in Kansas, to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale.

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior, in pursuance of an act approved May 8, 1872, has caused to be appraised the lands heretofore owned by the Kansas tribe of Indians, in the State of Kansas, which, by the terms of the treaty made by the United States and said Indians, and proclaimed November 17, 1860, were to be sold for the benefit of said Indians; which appraisement also includes all improvements on the same and the value of said improvements, distinguishing between improvements made by members of said Indian tribe, the United States, and white settlers; and whereas the appraisement thus made was so high that neither settlers nor purchasers were able to pay the same, and the said land has remained unsold from the passage of the act: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That each bona fide settler on any of the trust lands embraced in said act, heretofore reported as such by the commissioners appointed to make said appraisement, and the rejected claimants as bona fide settlers, who were recommended as such by Andrew C. Williams, acting under instructions to Superintendent Hoag, from the Indian Office, dated October 24, 1872, be permitted to make payment of the appraised value of their lands to the local land office at Topeka, Kansas, under such rules as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may adopt, in six equal annual installments, the first installment payable on the 1st of January, 1877, and the remaining installments payable annually from that time, and drawing interest at 6 per cent. per annum until paid: Provided, That, where there is timber on any of the lands to be sold under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of the Interior shall require the purchaser to enter into bond, with approved security, that he shall commit no waste on the timber or otherwise on said land until the last payment is made, and give his notes with a lien on the land to secure the purchase money thereof on the terms aforesaid.

SEC. 2. That all the remainder of the trust lands and of the undisposed portion of the diminished reserve shall be subject to entry at the local land office at Topeka, Kansas, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, unless a legal subdivision of a section shall be fractional and found to contain a greater number of acres by actual settlers, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of the General Land Office may prescribe. And the parties making such entries shall be required to make payment of the appraised value of the land entered and occupied by each in the following manner: One-sixth at the time that the entry is made and the remainder in five equal annual payments, drawing interest at 6 per cent. per annum, which payments shall be secured by notes payable to the United States and by mortgage on the premises, and the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold title until the last payment is made; and the Secretary of the Interior, where there is timber on the lands, shall in addition compel the purchaser to enter into bond, with approved security, to commit no waste by the destruction of timber or otherwise on the premises until final payment has been made; and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause patents in fee simple to be issued to all parties who shall complete purchases under the provisions of this act: Provided, That if any person or persons applying to purchase land under the provisions of this act shall fail to make payment or to perform any other conditions required by the provisions of this act or by rules and regulations that may be prescribed in the execution hereof, within ninety days after such payment shall become due or performance be required by the terms hereof or by the rules and regulations which may be prescribed in the execution hereof, such person or persons shall forfeit all rights under the provisions of this act and all claim or right to re-imbursement or compensation for previous action or payment by said person or persons under the provisions hereof; and the land proposed to be purchased by such person or persons shall again be subject to sale as though no action had been had in regard to the same.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the appraisement of these lands, and if he be satisfied that they have been appraised at more than their present cash value he may appoint a new commission of three persons to re-appraise the same, the per diem and expenses of which, at the rates heretofore paid to such commissioners, shall be deducted from the proceeds of said lands.

SEC. 4. That in preparing or giving their testimony all settlers or purchasers of land under the provisions of this act may have such testimony taken, after due and legal notice to the opposing party in interest, before any notary public or person qualified to administer an oath, and may forward such testimony with their application to the land offices or parties authorized to dispose of said lands, which testimony shall be received as if taken before the officers of such land office.

SEC. 5. That the net proceeds arising from such sales, after defraying the expenses of appraisement and sale which have heretofore or may hereafter be incurred, and also the outstanding indebtedness, principal and interest, of said Kansas tribe of Indians, which has heretofore been incurred under treaty stipulations, shall belong to said tribe in common, and may be used by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under direction of the President of the United States, in providing and improving for them new homes in the Indian Territory and in subsisting them until they become self-sustaining; and the residue not so required shall be placed to their credit on the books of the Treasury and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, and be held as a fund for their civilization, the interest of which, and the principal when deemed necessary by the President of the United States, may be used for such purpose.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the regular order.

TERM OF PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the business before the House is the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and made a special order for to-day after the morning hour. The Clerk will read the joint resolution reported by the committee and the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] as the views of the minority of the committee.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution:

ARTICLE XVI.

No person who has held, or may hereafter hold, the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

The Clerk also read the amendment offered by Mr. FRYE, as follows:

Strike out these words:

No person who has held, or may hereafter hold, the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

From and after the 4th day of March, in the year 1885, the term of office of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be six years; and any person having been elected to and held the office of President, or who for two years has held such office, shall be ineligible to a re-election.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HOLMAN.) The question is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE, on behalf of the minority of the committee. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, is entitled to the floor.

Mr. KNOTT. I do not propose at this time to enter into a discussion of the reasons which influenced the Committee on the Judiciary in reporting this proposed amendment to the Constitution. I desire merely to state as succinctly as possible the conclusions at which they arrived. The committee appreciated the unanimity of opinion everywhere that there should be some limit to eligibility to the office of President. The only question upon which there was any contrariety of judgment, as is apparent from the report of the committee and the views of the minority, was as to the length of the term. As the House knows, there were a variety of propositions submitted to the committee: one to extend the term to six years and render the incumbent forever after ineligible to the office of President; another extending the term to six years and rendering the incumbent ineligible for the six succeeding years; another extending the term to six years and making the President a Senator for life for the United States at large, after the expiration of his term of office; another limiting the term to four years.

After considering these various propositions the committee concluded that they could give to the people of this country no good reason why the presidential term should be extended beyond its present limits. An amendment to the Constitution in this direction is evidently in the interests of the people themselves, jealous at all times as they should be of executive power. The committee, therefore, were of opinion that no amendment extending the term beyond its present limits would meet the approbation of the people of this country, and that such a proposition would be entirely nugatory.

Neither could the committee appreciate the propriety or the importance of rendering the President eligible after the lapse of a given period of time. It occurred to them, I have no doubt, as it did to myself, that men make their calculations as though they expected to live always, and that a President in office, with an expectation of being elected again after the lapse of four or six years, would, if inclined to use his influence at all for the promotion of his own ambition, be under the same temptation as if he were immediatly re-elected.

The committee therefore submit to the House the proposition, simple and unadorned, that no person who has held or who may hereafter hold the office shall ever again be eligible for that office, believing that there never will be a time when suitable candidates cannot be found who will be more than willing to take the office upon those conditions. Whether I shall add anything more upon this question will depend upon what may be said by other gentlemen during the discussion. I now yield to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.]

Mr. NEW. I call for the reading of the joint resolution, introduced by myself, for information.

The resolution was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein.) That the following article be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of the Constitution, namely:

ARTICLE XVI.

From and after the next election for the President of the United States the President shall hold his office during the term of four years, and, together with the Vice-President chosen for the same term, be elected in the manner now provided by law, or as may hereafter be provided. But neither the President, the Vice-President, nor any other person in the office of President, as devolved upon him by law, shall be eligible to the office of President a third time.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed that the joint resolution just read leaves the matter of the presidential term where it is except that a third term by the same President is prohibited.

I shall not occupy much time. I cannot hope to present anything new, or which would not upon reflection occur to the minds of other members. The reasons which I shall assign in opposition to a one-term limitation, and in favor of eligibility to a second term with ineligibility to a third, will perhaps be familiar to all the members of this body. For the most part my arguments will be such as I have gleaned from reading the past history of this question and the history of the country.

We cannot overestimate the importance of the subject. We cannot fail to appreciate the disagreeable attitude in which we place ourselves, as also the possible serious consequences to the future of the country if our action here should lead to a change in the Constitution and that change should turn out to be a mistake. For one, sir, I admit now at the very threshold of my remarks that I am not fully convinced that the public safety requires any alteration in the Constitution relating to the executive term. But if any step is to be taken in that direction, then, sir, in my judgment the modification proposed in my proposition is the one and only one that should be made.

In the convention which framed the Constitution there was a marked difference of opinion among the delegates as to what should be the length of the President's term of office, as also the manner of his election and the powers with which he should be invested.

Luther Martin, attorney-general of Maryland, and one of the delegates in the Federal Convention, in an address delivered by him to the house of delegates of Maryland when that body was considering whether Maryland should ratify the Constitution, said:

Many of the members were desirous that the President should be elected for seven years and not to be eligible a second time. Others proposed that he should not be absolutely ineligible, but that he should not be capable of being chosen a second time until the expiration of a certain number of years. The supporters of the above proposition went upon the idea that the best security for liberty was a limited duration and a rotation of office in the chief executive department.

There was a party who attempted to have the President appointed during good behavior, without any limitation as to time, and not being able to succeed in that attempt they then endeavored to have him re-eligible without any restraint. It was objected that the choice of a President to continue in office during good behavior would at once be rendering our system an elective monarchy, and that if the President was to be re-eligible without any interval of disqualification it would amount nearly to the same thing, since, from the powers that the President is to enjoy and the interest and influences with they will be attended, he will be almost absolutely certain of being re-elected from time to time as long as he lives.

I find, Mr. Speaker, by reference to the debates on the Constitution, that on the 29th of May, 1787, Edmund Randolph, a delegate from Virginia, submitted to the convention certain resolutions or propositions as a draught or plan of national government. Charles Pinckney and others did the same. Mr. Randolph's proposition as to the executive was as follows:

That a national executive be instituted, to be chosen by the national legislature for the term of —— years, to receive punctually at stated times a fixed compensation for the services rendered, in which no increase or diminution shall be made so as to affect the magistracy existing at the time of the increase or diminution; to be ineligible a second time, &c.

Mr. Pinckney's article was as follows:

The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a President of the United States of America, which shall be his style; and his title shall be His Excellency. He shall be elected for —— years, and shall be re-eligible, &c.

Alexander Hamilton proposed that the supreme executive authority of the United States should be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior. William Pattison, of New Jersey, thought the federal executive should consist of more than one person, to be elected by Congress, and be re-eligible.

Afterward, on the 19th of June, 1787, it was resolved that the executive should consist of a single person; to be chosed by the national legislature for the term of seven years, to be ineligible a second time. This proposition was soon afterward, together with others relating to the entire system of government, referred to a special committee of five, (Messrs. Rutledge, Randolph, Gorham, Ellsworth, and Wilson,) for the purpose of reporting a constitution. This committee, on the 6th of August, 1787, reported a draught of a constitution, section 1 of article 10 providing as follows:

The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a single person. His style to be "The President of the United States of America;" and his title shall be "His Excellency." He shall be elected by ballot by the legislature. He shall hold his office during a term of seven years, but shall not be elected a second time.

It would seem, Mr. Speaker, that the most democratic days of the Republic were not its earliest days. Subsequently a committee of revision was appointed, which, on the 12th of September, 1787, reported the Constitution in the form in which it was finally adopted.

The uncertainty and confusion which existed in the minds of the very foremost men of the convention as to what number of years should constitute a presidential term, as also whether he should be limited to one or more terms, and as to the manner of his election, is strikingly apparent to the student who carefully looks into the proceedings of that convention.

Mr. Madison, in a letter to Robert Lee of date February 22, 1830, said:

The question of re-eligibility in the case of a President of the United States admits of rival views, and is the more delicate because it cannot be decided with equal lights from actual experiment. In general it may be observed that the evils most complained of are less connected with that particular question than with the process of electing the Chief Magistrate and the powers vested in him.

It will be observed that this letter was written more than forty years after Washington's first election, and after Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe had each served two terms and Jackson was serving his first with an absolute certainty of a second.

At the date of Mr. Madison's letter there had been four double terms, so to speak, and but two single terms, those of John Adams and John Quincy Adams. It will be seen, therefore, that as to a service of two terms in succession by the same President more light had been received than as to single terms up to the time when that letter was written. No Government was ever more united, more prosperous, and more respected at home and abroad than was this during the second terms, as well as the first, of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, and Jackson; and no Chief Magistrate ever retired from official place with personal and official honor more unsullied than did the Presidents just named. There is every reason to believe that, if the two Adams's had each been re-elected, their second terms would have been without stain or dishonor.

Mr. Lincoln was elected a second time in the midst of civil war. After entering upon his second term the conflict terminated with the Union preserved. The great issue involved in that unparalleled fratricidal conflict of arms was decided as he would have it. May we not hope and believe that it has been settled and unalterably adjudicated forever? The best blood of the fairest spot of God's creation—the land anointed—has been shed in atonement of our national sins. Before God, I declare it to be my honest belief that the Federal Union is to-day stronger at home and more respected abroad than ever before.

And at this point I cannot forbear saying that, while the healed wounds of our late struggle are not altogether free from sensitiveness and soreness and while those wounds in my judgment have been unnecessarily irritated and almost re-opened in this House, yet it will not be denied that there is now a better feeling among the members of this body and a more sincere purpose to move forward in the work of legislation, with oblivion for the past, for the future good of the whole country, than existed here for many years before our civil war. We have every reason for believing and declaring that we are now starting anew in the great race of national life with fewer weights and entanglements to impede and fetter our steps than ever before.

It has been said by a distinguished American patriot that there is no nation which has not at some period or other in its history felt an absolute necessity of the services of particular men in particular stations as vital even to the preservation of its political existence. Thus we have Madison entering upon his second term while the war of 1812 was in progress. Jackson had been voted for and elected the second time when, in December, 1832, it became necessary to promptly rebuke and put down nullification. The salutary effect will not soon be forgotten of the proclamation which he issued at that time, containing an exposition of the principles and powers of the General Government and expressing a determination to maintain the laws.

General Grant is now serving his second term. It is probably too soon to impartially judge of his first, while, as for the second, it is not yet concluded. Some of us, doubtless in some degree affected by party bias and political prejudice, think his executive services to the country not of extraordinary merit, but whether it would have been better or worse for the people if some other aspirant had secured the prize we can never know. The fair thing probably in this regard would be to give all aspirants who failed to obtain the place the benefit of the doubt.

I maintain that no argument unfavorable to the second election of the same President can fairly be drawn from the past history of the country taken as a whole.

Would it be wise to limit the Executive to a single term in the future? I answer that it would not. If confined to one term, he would in my opinion be more inclined to overlook and disregard the public good where his own personal interest or ambition was in the way. If eligible to re-election there would be greater disposition and inducement to keep within the lines marked out for him by the Constitution, and to make his administration efficient and just, for to do this would be to give himself character with his countrymen and thus prepare the way for re-election. He would be more attentive to learn the will and the wants of the people. He would give less heed to the counsels of bad men and court the advice and good-will of those in whom the people have confidence and who by their public services and high character give tone to public opinion.

Again, sir, great measures, especially of practical reform, cannot always be undertaken and accomplished in one term, and therefore a President ineligible to a second election would be less disposed and his friends less apt to prompt him to undertake such measures; or, if undertaken, he, together with his cabinet and party, would feel less responsibility, and would be held to less accountability by the country, if for want of time the work could not be brought to a successful conclusion. And this argument applies with equal force to any plan where there is an intervening term of ineligibility prior to a second term, as in the minority report.

In this connection I wish to read from Story on the Constitution. He says:

> Another ill effect of the exclusion would be depriving the community of the advantage of the experience gained by an able chief magistrate in the exercise of office. Experience is the parent of wisdom. And it would seem almost absurd to say that it ought systematically to be excluded from the executive office. It would be equivalent to banishing merit from the public councils, because it had been tried. What could be more strange than to declare, at the moment when wisdom was acquired, that the possessor of it should no longer be enabled to use it for the very purposes for which it was acquired?

Again he says:

> In short, the exclusion, whether perpetual or temporary, would have nearly the same effects, and those effects would be generally pernicious rather than salutary. Re-eligibility naturally connects itself to a certain extent with duration of office. The latter is necessary to give the officer himself the inclination and the resolution to act his part well, and the community time and leisure to observe the tendency of his measures, and thence to form an experimental estimate of his merits. The former is necessary to enable the people, when they see reason to approve of his conduct, to continue him in the station in order to prolong the utility of his virtues and talents and to secure to the Government the advantage of permanence in a wise system of administration.

Mr. Speaker, it is too obvious to admit of any doubt that the tendency of ineligibility to a second term is to beget and continue uncertainty and instability—conditions of government all the while racking and straining its entire machinery. This is a homely thought, but the truth involved cannot be successfully controverted.

Chancellor Kent has said that the election of a supreme executive magistrate for a whole nation affects so many interests, addresses itself so strongly to popular passions, and holds out such powerful temptations to ambition that it necessarily becomes a strong trial to public virtue, and even hazardous to the public tranquillity.

But, Mr. Speaker, I maintain that a second election of the same President as his own immediate successor is less calculated to beget a dangerous political convulsion or revolution than where each election must furnish a new President, before untried.

I have heard it asserted that Jefferson was in favor of a single term with ineligibility forever thereafter. I have taken some pains to ascertain his opinions, and find that his declarations upon that subject, taken as a whole, are exactly the opposite of that proposition.

It may not be uninteresting to hear what Mr. Jefferson has said in this regard. I now read an extract from a letter written by him to Colonel Humphreys, March 18, 1789. He says:

> It has not, however, authorized us to consider as a real defect what I thought and still think one, the perpetual re-eligibility of the President. But three States out of the eleven having declared against this, we must suppose we are wrong, according to the fundamental law of every society, the ex majoris partis, to which we are bound to submit. And should the majority change their opinion, and become sensible that this trait in their Constitution is wrong, I would wish it to remain uncorrected as long as we can avail ourselves of the services of our great leader, whose talents and whose weight of character I consider as peculiarly necessary to get the Government so under way as that it may afterward be carried on by subordinate characters.

It will be observed that the point which he makes in this letter is against the "perpetual re-eligibility of the President."

Just the objectionable feature which is met by my joint resolution.

I read again from a letter written by him to James Martin, September 20, 1813. He says:

> I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making public functionaries independent of the nation for life or even for a long term of years. On this principle I prefer the presidential term of four years to that of seven years, which I myself had at first suggested, annexing to it, however, ineligibility forever thereafter; and I wish it were now annexed to the second quadrennial election of President.

It thus clearly appears to have been the opinion of Jefferson that four years should constitute a presidential term, and that he should be permitted to serve a second term, but not a third. This letter was written twenty-five years after Washington's first election, and after Mr. Jefferson had witnessed the operations and progress of the Government under two terms of Washington, one of John Adams, two of his own, and one of Madison. He did not die until July 4, 1826. He left no modification of this belief that I have been able to find.

Those who advocate a single term, as also those who are willing to consent to re-election a second time with an intervening term of ineligibility, urge with much ardor and some plausibility that when eligible to an immediate second term the President may make use of his vast patronage to assure a second election.

There is not much force in this argument when carefully examined and when considered in the light of the past history of the country. It is not an unnatural or dishonorable ambition to desire a second term, and it is safe to assume that every President has had that aspiration and in some degree has arranged for that result during his first term. We have already had fifteen Presidents, not counting Harrison and Taylor, both of whom died soon after their inauguration. Eight of these, John Adams, John Q. Adams, Martin Van Buren, John Tyler, Millard Fillmore, Franklin Pierce, James Buchanan, and Andrew Johnson, were never re-elected, and I believe none of the eight, except John Adams and Martin Van Buren, secured a renomination, much less a second election.

The vast multitude of Federal office-holders it may be are ready to do the bidding of the official head that gives them official being. But it must be remembered that this class will work with no less zeal for the candidate of their political faith, whoever he may be, knowing that defeat will result in their displacement. Indeed, I am of the opinion that they will labor with even greater effect where the candidate is a new man of their party, hoping thereby that they will be continued in place as a reward of merit.

It might as well be said that members of this body, or of the Senate, should not be re-eligible for the like reason. It cannot be denied that Senators and Representatives will in the bestowment of favors prefer, as other people do, their friends, and thus indirectly at least benefit themselves in the future. This needs no denial or apology, for it is not undignified or dishonorable to do so when the favors are bestowed upon worthy friends. The fact is, Mr. Speaker, those who retain their seats here the longest are generally, to the credit of our form of government be it said, the wisest and best men of both parties, and I suspect that those of us who are here for the first time would cut a sorry figure without them.

If we were limited here to a single term, I doubt if we would be quite so careful in the discharge of our duties. In the very nature of things this is true. If an account of stewardship is not required, the temptation to subordinate the general welfare to private gain is greatly increased. The corrupt legislator would care little for investigation after he had passed beyond the penalty. Indeed, the incentive and effort to expose fraud would lose much, if not all, their momentum and value if after the exposure the unworthy public servant was practically free from responsibility.

I cannot see why these considerations do not apply with much greater force to the Executive; for his opportunities for dishonest gain are immeasurably superior to those of any other public officer or class of officers.

If it be said that my argument against a limitation to a single term applies to a second term with ineligibility thereafter, I answer that the President who discharges or tries to discharge his whole duty for the first four years, from whatever motive, is more apt to continue in well-doing than he who has made no such record. Moreover, as a general rule our Presidents are taken from the lists of those who by long public service are well known to the people and the past lives of whom give assurance of adequate ability and moral fitness. The American people are not slow in separating the drifting, floating dross from the pure metal.

The fear of the selection of unworthy men was the cause of much distrust in the early days of the Republic. Mr. Madison, in a letter written in May, 1830, said:

> In the mean time I cannot feel all the alarm you express at the prospect for the future as reflected from the mirror of the past. It will be a rare case that the presidential contest will not issue in a choice that will not discredit the station and not be acquiesced in by the unsuccessful party, foreseeing, as it must do, the appeal to be again made at no very distant day to the will of the nation.

Mr. Speaker, it may at wide intervals in the history of the country, in times of great excitement, when the minds of the people are fixed more upon startling passing events than upon the true merit of men, happen that an incompetent Executive will be chosen. Such periods will be rare with us. If the people make a mistake four years will give them ample time to take the second sober thought; and if they do not and will not prevent its recurrence I know of no remedy afforded by our political system.

When the people become so indifferent and dead to the preservation and enjoyment of their own liberties that with full knowledge of the unfitness of a candidate for President they will nevertheless elect him, what power will control them?

Whenever they reach that degree of moral and civil stolidity and unfitness for self-government, they will not hesitate to trample under their feet every constitutional limitation and restraint created for their benefit and protection.

It cannot be said with much plausibility that our elections are too frequent. The difference between four years and six years (as recommended by the minority report) is hardly appreciable. So long as our people are possessed of the intelligence and education peculiarly essential to the stability and perpetuity of our form of Government there cannot be in the future, as there has not been in the past, any real danger to their liberties in holding a presidential election every four years. Whenever the people fall below the required educational standard, then it matters little how frequent or how seldom our elections are held, for our liberties will not survive long thereafter. An ignorant minority will not long respect the will of an ignorant majority.

Mr. Speaker, it is a most significant and instructive fact, that, determined as an overwhelming majority of the people are against all third-term schemes and ambitions, they have had little to say against a second term. And, sir, I believe it must be the deliberate sense of this body that if we adopt the majority report or take any action looking to one term only, or if we adopt the minority report, our constituents will be either opposed to or indifferent to such a result; because they have not been expecting it, do not ask it, and will decide, in my opinion, after all the arguments are heard and pondered, that such action was visionary and experimental, not suggested or demanded by anything in the past history of the Union, and not the product of clear-headed and non-partisan statesmanship.

It will be observed that the strongest arguments which can be adduced in favor of the majority report, or the minority report, are predicated upon dangers to public safety and liberty anticipated, and not upon dangers realized in the past. That a hundred years have elapsed without a single crisis attributable to the constitutional provision declaratory of the term of office of the President is an argument more potent and more convincing than any reasoning that can be produced favoring a change on the ground of events which may never transpire.

Mr. Speaker, I assert that even if it could be shown that all the fathers had in the most unmistakable language declared in favor of a single term, an argument resting upon that concurrent opinion would weigh only as the merest atom against the incontrovertible fact that from the election of the first President to the present time the constitutional provision upon that subject has been an unqualified success.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 279) to establish a land office in the southern part of Utah Territory, to be known as Beaver district, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas.

TERM OF PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

The House resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KNOTT. Before this debate proceeds further, I desire to say that there are a number of gentlemen who wish to be heard, but who cannot under the existing order of the House be heard, unless that order is modified. I propose, therefore, to ask the unanimous consent of the House that debate shall continue during the session of to-day, and that I may have the floor assigned to me immediately after the morning hour to-morrow, to move the previous question and close the debate. I suppose there will be no objection to that arrangement.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FRYE. I desire to call the attention of the House in as few words as I can to certain suggestions, which seem to me practical, in relation to this proposed constitutional amendment. I would like the Clerk to report the amendment which is now pending as a substitute for the majority report.

The Clerk again read Mr. FRYE'S proposed amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Now, sir, the majority resolution is that no person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President of the United States shall ever again be eligible to the office. There are no party politics, as I understand it, involved at all in the question before the House, and, as I understand further, this is a serious proposition, made, I suppose, in answer to demands from some source, from somewhere, that the Constitution shall be amended. Therefore, whatever action we take looking thitherward, of course we have got to consider primarily the question whether or not the proposition we offer shall be approved by three-fourths of the States, which are required for its adoption, else our work is all useless.

Now there seem to me, Mr. Speaker, two or three well-founded objections to the majority resolution. And first, the term of office is too short. Why, sir, there are no men in the country who understand better than members of Congress of how great importance experience is in this matter of office for the better performance of its duties. When I came here to the Congress of the United States, for the first two years I found myself a complete, ignoble, unworthy cipher, and in my modesty and humility again and again in the thoughts by day and in the dreams by night I determined to resign the position and get out of a place where I was so utterly useless. I suppose that there is not a modest or sensitive man in the House who has not again and again experienced the same feelings. There are a dozen men of experience in this House, having been here term after term, holding commanding positions and swaying the legislation of the House hither and thither just as they please. Whence comes that power? From pre-eminent ability? From superior intellect? From excellence in learning? No, sir. From experience in the performance of the duties devolving upon members of Congress. They in everything else have their peers in hundreds of men on this floor who are here to-day for the first term. And, sir, it seems to me that the same rule holds good in the office of President of the United States. If he is fit to be elected to the position he will be a better man the second term than in the first. He will perform his duties more wisely during the second term than the first. I submit therefore to the House that when you limit the presidential term to four years you are forcing upon the country a loss of valuable experience which it might otherwise enjoy, in my opinion, without any prayer from the people, even against their wishes.

I, sir, do not believe for one that they have ever asked any such proposition as this. I never have seen it in any press representing the people and their voice. I submit if they have desired any change in the term at all it has been in favor of one of six years, not one limited to four and that no man shall be eligible to a second term.

Again, sir, there is a serious objection to it. It provides that no person who has held the office of President shall be eligible to a re-election. Then, sir, suppose a Vice-President who by the death of the President has held that position for two hours' time or two days' time, he will be forever ineligible as President of the United States. Sir, it seems to me that proper consideration has not been given to that, for there is no reason why a Vice-President accidentally taking office for a few days or a few weeks shall be made ineligible to the office of President of the United States. In those days or those weeks he cannot by any possibility have gained that control of the patronage of the country which will endanger the liberties of the people or improperly secure his election. He may be the man of all others we desire for that high office, and yet we cannot be gratified.

Again, sir, I submit that this amendment never can be adopted by three-fourths of the States of this Union. And why? Suppose the democratic party—a forced hypothesis I admit—come into power and elect its President in the next election. It has been out of power for fifteen years. It went out of power when the patronage of the Government was comparatively small; it will come back again into power when the patronage of that Government is immense, so immense that to-day it has frightened the people, if they have sought it, into seeking an amendment of the Constitution so that that patronage shall not be used. Now, sir, I submit to my democratic friends, if they elect the next President of the United States and he has that patronage in his hands, is there a hod-carrier in the remotest town of all our borders who will not be instructed by their party, then in power, to vote at the polls against this amendment to the Constitution? You know this will be so; it is absurd were we to ask the question. Will they not say, We are in power; we have the patronage now and can retain power by its use and re-elect the President of the United States. Shall not we, as republicans, if we prevail, instruct our men to vote against the adoption of that amendment? Certainly we would do it, and under no such circumstances would three-fourths of the States be induced to adopt it, and it would thus become mere child's-play.

The minority of the committee submit a different proposition, one for a six-year term; and I have given my reasons why I prefer that. It provides, somewhat curiously perhaps to those who have not reflected upon the subject, that, if adopted, the amendment shall not take effect until the year 1885. Why 1885? Because when we propose a resolution to the House we propose it seriously, thinking that the people need it and that they may adopt it. Now suppose that we had said that from and after the next election this amendment should go into effect, what would be the result? The very first question, a very serious one, presented would be this: Would it affect the term of office of the next President? If it does, then, being adopted six months or a year after the election of the next President, it would make a six-year President out of one elected for four years.

Now, suppose that the democrats should elect their candidate for President at the next election. Is it possible that the republican voters of the country will vote for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution which will give that democratic President two years longer of office than he was entitled to on the day he was elected? Of course not; and every republican in the country will vote against the adoption of such an amendment as that.

Suppose, then, you put it off until 1881, as has been proposed. Then you are in this condition: Suppose that next year we elect our candidate for President. The amendment as adopted will take effect in 1881, making the term of office six years and the President ineligible for re-election. Having elected our President, how natural is it for us to say, Our President is a good man, and every President hitherto elected has had an opportunity for re-election; ours only of the men elected to the office is limited to this one term of four years; the next one to be elected and all thereafter will have six years of office. That will be an invidious distinction against the President of the party in power, and every member of that party will vote against the adoption of such an amendment, and you cannot get three-fourths of the States to adopt it, and the amendment will fall through.

Now put off the operation of the amendment if adopted until 1885, and you will have removed it from all these difficulties which otherwise beset it. You have made it certain that if it commends itself to the people it will be adopted by them. No party, as such, would necessarily be arrayed against it.

Now, while I have reported this amendment in behalf of the minority of the committee, I am free to confess that I do not see any necessity for it. I am free to confess that I have heard no voice from the people demanding that their rights shall be thus protected, telling us that their liberties were in danger, and that their privileges were being unduly limited. I see no necessity whatever for any amendment to the Constitution in relation to this subject. Feeling, however, that an amendment was demanded by members of this House and by the press, and that one was liable to be recommended to the people for adoption, I preferred the proposition of the minority to that of the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Hitherto in amending the Constitution of the United States there has seemed to be an impending and inevitable necessity existing for such action. Just look at the several amendments to the Constitution which have from time to time been adopted. First is the following:

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

That was adopted from a pure spirit of religion, in order to remove religion from political strife and to keep the hand of power of the state from it. For that purpose it was absolutely required that such an amendment should be ingrafted upon the Constitution. The second, third, fourth, and fifth amendments are as follows:

A well-regulated militia, being necessary to the security of a free state, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

No soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house, without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

And so all the way through the amendments which have hitherto been adopted. The rights, the liberties, the privileges of the people are protected by them. Look at the thirteenth amendment prohibiting slavery in the United States. It had been almost the death of this Republic. By the inevitable logic of war slavery itself had died. Was it not a necessity, an impending, an imperative necessity to provide in the Constitution that there should be no resurrection of it forever and ever in this Republic? And that was done.

Then came the fourteenth. Four millions of people held in slavery had been made free and left in the country where they had been slaves. Did not their safety demand that they should be made citizens? Ah! sir, human nature is such that the people of this Republic dared not trust those men only as freemen in the hands of their old masters. There were thousands and tens of thousands of them who would have dealt kindly, fairly, and generously with them; but there were also thousands who would have reduced them to peonage worse than slavery, where they would have had all the unrequited toil and none of the protective influences of slavery. Therefore you amended the Constitution so as to make them citizens of the United States.

Then you provided by the fifteenth amendment that these persons being citizens, those States where a majority might wish to legislate in the interest of that majority and against the interest of this poor minority should be prevented from taking from them the right of suffrage, should have no power to do so. Did not the liberties, rights, and privileges of the people demand this action?

Now comes a proposition for the sixteenth. Look these articles through from one to sixteen, as now proposed. I ask if you can find existing to-day anywhere any such an abiding, impending, or imperative necessity as existed when each one of the other amendments to the Constitution was proposed and adopted? Why is it, then, that Congress here to-day is offering to the people this sixteenth article for their adoption? It has been whispered in my ear why it is done. The power of the press of this country is an overwhelming power; it is almost omnipotent. Since I have been in Congress I have learned that it legislates on the floor of this Hall again and again and again; that its influence controls my vote and yours. O, that it might be always a power for good, a power for righteousness, a power for justice and humanity. But it is a power, and as such must be recognized in the land.

Now, sir, a paper, powerful, in its resources wonderful, in the ability of its management marvelous—one paper of the metropolitan press—sent out one day through the country, sent up a cry of "Cæsar! Cæsar!" and up Cæsar's ghost sprang into the air, and from that day till now that ghost will not down at any man's bidding. That raven "still is sitting" there; and no power seems to be able to drive him from the perch where that great paper put him.

But, sir, did the people of the country fear the ghost of Cæsarism? Did they fear that a new Cromwell had sprung up? I tell you no. The press in that case was ahead of the honest toiling people. They knew that if you look for the highest type of the purest integrity you will find it in the officers of the Army and Navy of the United States; and when they heard that voice of the greatest living soldier saying to them again and again, in the simplest language, "I have no thought for a third term, I am not expecting a third term," they believed him, they trusted him, as I do, and the third term "spook" was only a myth. When his voice came to them they required no affidavit, no solemnities of oath from the loved commander. The great scare seemed to affect our democratic friends alone. They tremble for the safety of the Republic, and Cæsarism is their terrible nightmare.

True I have met politicians now and then outside of the democratic party who quivered with fear of a "third term" and talked about this immense patronage. Whose patronage is it? Why, sir, in my city, a city of twenty-two thousand inhabitants, there is one Federal office-holder. Suppose the President of the United States sends to him and tells him to secure delegates from that section of the State in a national convention, what fearful result would follow? Why, he has hardly the power of an ordinary citizen; his office hampers him. His voice would not be heard; his touch would not be felt. Whose patronage is it? Who appointed that man to his Federal office? Why, sir, I did; not the President of the United States. The President signs his commission; but we understand perfectly well that we the representatives of the people really appoint these officers. They come to us; they look to us; and if anybody has patronage, it is members of this House and of the Senate—men who are close to these office-holders, whom they can touch and handle and direct and control in their own cities and their own districts. There is the danger, if there is danger anywhere.

But, sir, I learned long ago that the patronage which a member of Congress has is weakness to him, not power. Why not then weakness to the President of the United States? If this patronage is such a fearful power to put into the hands of the President, why not adopt a constitutional amendment limiting the term of office of Senators of the United States? I say they have a closer control over the fruits of patronage than the President has. If this is a power to be used for harm, why not adopt a constitutional amendment prohibiting us from holding more than one term?

I have heard, sir, that the members of this House use the patronage of their districts to secure their re-election. I have heard that they travel from Department to Department getting clerks into office; that they fill the custom-houses in their districts with men of their own selection; that their appointees overrun the navy-yards of the country; and that the power which they thus heap up is used by them to secure their renomination and re-election. Why not then introduce a constitutional amendment providing that no member of Congress shall be re-elected? Limit Congressmen to a single term, and then God save the country and the legislation of the country. The folly of utter inexperience would be fearfully apparent.

As I have already stated, I have submitted the minority report simply because it seemed to me the House would adopt either that or that of the majority; and I believed, for the reasons I have given in this feeble, off-hand manner, without any special preparation or thought, that if any proposition on this subject was to be submitted to the people this was preferable in all its parts to the other. I am free to say that if the amendment should be adopted I shall still vote against the passage of the joint resolution, because I believe we shall all find after the republican party have elected their next President—a man chosen from those whom we respect and love—the man of our choice, wise, sagacious, and patriotic—your third-term goblin is then damned for ever and ever; and after that damnation you may propose your constitutional amendment to the people, and hardly a man, white or black, naturalized or native, would be scared enough to vote for it.

Mr. MCCRARY. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to discuss this question at any great length. There seems to be a general agreement on both sides of the House that an amendment to the Constitution upon this subject shall be submitted to the Legislatures of the several States. It is in no sense a party question. During the long series of years when the democratic party was in power in this country no proposition of this kind was ever submitted. The public sentiment in favor of it has grown up within the last few years, and has, I think, had its origin in the vast increase of the power and patronage of the Chief Executive of the nation. In my opinion the public sentiment in favor of such an amendment is well founded, and I doubt not that gentlemen on both sides favor it from the highest motives. I differ from my friend and colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] in the position taken by him, that there is no public sentiment in favor of a one-term amendment. It has been and is earnestly advocated by many of the best and ablest men in the land of both parties.

The Committee on the Judiciary are quite unanimous in the opinion that an amendment on this subject shall be submitted. The only matter of difference in the committee was as to the form of the amendment. It being agreed that we shall submit an amendment limiting the incumbent of the presidential office to a single term, the first question, of course, is as to the length of that term. The majority have recommended that it be limited to four years, and in some cases, as I shall show presently, they have recommended that it be limited to a very much shorter period. The minority recommend that the term of the President shall be six years.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of good in the old plan which our fathers adopted and embodied in the Constitution. What we should desire is to preserve as far as we can all the good there is in the old plan and yet secure as far as we may all the good that is proposed by the new plan. The good of the old plan is that it gives to the people of the country the benefit of experience in this great office of President. Can we not preserve that, and at the same time avoid the evil which exists and the danger which threatens under the present Constitution growing out of the immense patronage of the executive office? I think, sir, we can, and I think we may do it, at least in a large measure, by the adoption of the report of the minority.

This amendment to the Constitution which we now propose is in some sense anti-democratic in its character. It takes from the people of the United States the power which they have always held under the Constitution, and which, whatever other gentlemen may say, I venture to assert they have always exercised with wisdom—the power to decide for themselves, after a man has served in that office for four years, whether they will continue him for four years more. The proposition is to take from the people the right to re-elect. Now, sir, if we do that, is it not fair and reasonable that we should give to the people in return the right to appropriate the experience of a man who has served in the office of President for four years? Why not give them the services for two years more of the experienced President under conditions that will secure the people against an abuse of power?

The reason why an amendment to the Constitution is demanded, if it be demanded, is that the patronage of this office has, since the adoption of the Constitution, grown to such enormous proportion that, in the hands of a bad man, it would become an exceedingly dangerous power, by the use of which he might perpetuate, or at least seek to perpetuate, his own rule. But we may get rid of that evil by adopting the six-year term, and yet not be compelled in all cases to dispense with the services of a President at the very time when those services have become most valuable. The fact that so many Presidents have been re-elected shows that the people value the right of re-election. They value it because they know the value of experience in this office.

Experience is of great value in all places of public trust, but especially so in this place. Our vast and intricate foreign and internal concerns are of such a nature and so extensive that time and experience are absolutely essential, in order that the President may master them and fit himself for the proper and efficient discharge of the duties of his office. So I think, Mr. Speaker, that by making the term of the President six years, instead of four, we give to the people the benefit of experience in this office, and by making the President ineligible to re-election we at the same time avoid the danger that exists under the Constitution as it now is.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another reason why I believe the term of the President should be six years instead of four. In my opinion presidential elections are too frequent. The great excitements, the upheavals, the convulsions of the body-politic which always attend these presidential struggles produce an injurious effect upon all the interests of the people of the country. The time, the labor, the money that are taken from other channels and absorbed in these great political contests, if used in other directions, would be of incalculable value and benefit to the people. These evils incident to a great popular commotion are not, of course, to be compared with the benefits of our system of popular government, but they are real evils nevertheless, and to be mitigated as far as they may be without injury to that system.

Presidential elections are especially injurious to the business and financial interests of the country. They always involve the question whether the policy of the Government on these subjects shall be changed or not, and whether the result of the election determines that the old policy shall be continued or that it shall be set aside and a new one inaugurated; there is in either case a long period of uncertainty and suspense. I believe if our elections, State and Federal, were not so frequent it would be better for the interests of the country, because in that case our people would take more interest in them. There are many of our best citizens who refuse to give any time or attention whatever to public or political affairs. They say one struggle is scarcely over until another is begun, and that if they give their attention to these things they must neglect their private interests and business affairs. This is the excuse which many of the best people of the country give for neglecting what ought to be regarded by every citizen as the most important and sacred duty. With a presidential election once in four years, with annual State, county, and municipal elections in most States, and with biennial elections for Representatives in Congress, what wonder is it that too many people have come to regard politics as a trade which only a few understand and follow.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another objection to the report of the majority to which I would like to call the attention of the House. That report provides that—

> No person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

That, of course, includes the case of a person who shall be elected and hold the office for four years, but it also includes the case of a Vice-President or acting Vice-President who may succeed to the office of President and hold it for a single day, because every man who has ever held the office of President for any period of time, however short, is rendered forever ineligible to be elected again. Why is this? The reason for the exclusion of a man who has held the office for four years does not reach the man who has held the office for a single day or a single week or a single month.

The Vice-President may succeed to the office of President, and he may not exercise one of the great powers of the office. He may appoint no man to office. He may do no single executive act. And yet, if the powers and duties of the office have devolved upon him for a single day, under the report of the majority, he is to be rendered forever ineligible. The theory upon which the one-term amendment is defended—and the only theory upon which it can be defended—is that the incumbent may during his first term misuse the patronage of the office for the purpose of securing a re-election. This theory, however, does not apply to the Vice-President who has succeeded to the office and held it only for a brief period.

The minority report, therefore, provides that whoever has been elected to the office of President or whoever has succeeded to that office and held it for two years shall be forever ineligible. And in that respect I think the minority report is vastly superior to that of the majority. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say in conclusion that, unlike my friend from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] I am earnestly in favor of this proposition. I am in favor of it because I believe it to be a step, although perhaps but a short step, in the direction of a great reform. But, sir, I do not regard this proposition as reaching the real source of the evil. The great evil and the great difficulty are not that the President is eligible to re-election. The great evil and the great difficulty come from the fact that has already been alluded to, that the power and the patronage of the President of the United States have grown to such enormous proportions that it is more and greater than any one person in this country ought to hold in his hands.

Sir, the remedy is not in limiting the President to a single term, but the remedy is in such wise and well-considered measures of constitutional amendment as shall take from the President a great part of the patronage which he now has and shall vest it in the people. There is no difficulty in adopting measures of this character. When the Constitution of the United States was adopted there were but about seventy-five post-offices in the United States. To-day the number is very nearly fifty thousand. Every one of the postmasters in this country ought to be elected by the people in the vicinity where the post-office is located. If there is an officer under the Government of the United States who ought to be chosen by the people who have to transact business with him it is the postmaster. That officer deals daily with all classes of the people, and his dealings with them relate to matters which touch some of the most sacred relations in life. Had Congress authority to provide for their election, how easy it would be to designate by some competent authority the limits of each post-office district within which residents and voters who are to choose the postmaster shall reside. The same thing is true of numerous other Federal officials whose duties are local. I hope, sir, that this House, before dismissing this question entirely from its consideration, will propose another amendment to the Constitution which shall provide for the election of all such. By that means more than half of this great power and patronage which overwhelm the President will be taken from him. I care not, sir, how honest, I care not how able, how patriotic a President may be, it is simply impossible that he should discharge the duties which now devolve upon the presidential office with that understanding, with that information, with that knowledge concerning each and every one of his official acts which every officer of the Government ought to possess. No one man can appoint ninety or one hundred thousand Federal officials and act in any large proportion of the cases upon any information except that which he derives from others.

It is said, sir, that this is the patronage of members of Congress. Practically it is so, but I submit that that does not help the matter; that, on the contrary, is one of the evils which we wish to get rid of. What right have I, sir, to say who shall be postmaster at every post-office in the district which I represent? What right have I to determine for the people of my district who shall serve them in these places? The people themselves are the parties who alone are interested and who should determine that question. Besides, sir, it sometimes happens, I will not say that it happens very often, but it does sometimes happen that members of Congress regard the appointments which are supposed to be under their control as so much capital, with which they can control so much influence and command so many votes. This may happen; it is one of the possible evils under the existing system, and as we are legislating to remove possible dangers it is my opinion that we ought to remove this, as it is not only a possible but a real and a present evil.

I say, sir, then I am in favor of the proposed amendment. I believe that it is demanded by a just public sentiment. I believe it is right and I believe it is a step in the right direction; but I am by no means ready to admit that by the adoption of this proposition the great evils of which the country complains will be cured. On the contrary, I think that further and more radical measures than this will have to be adopted.

Mr. CAULFIELD rose.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask the gentleman to give way to me for a moment. I desire to rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I find that in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of yesterday there is an injustice done to me in the report of the proceedings. In printing the resolution which I introduced for the investigation of the several Pacific railroads, the RECORD omits the Central Pacific Railroad, the very first on the list. I have examined the original resolution, now in the hands of the Clerk, and I find it correct. I hope the correction will be made in the RECORD, and I ask that the resolution be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered. The preamble and resolution are as follows:

Whereas the several railroad companies hereinafter named, to wit, the Central Pacific, the Kansas Pacific, the Union Pacific, the Central Branch Union Pacific, the Western Pacific, the Southern Pacific, the Sioux City and Pacific, the Northern Pacific, the Texas and Pacific, and all Pacific roads or branches to which bonds or other subsidies have been granted by the Government, have received from the United States, under the act of Congress of July 1, 1862, act of March 3, 1871, and the several acts amendatory thereof, money subsidies amounting to over $64,000,000, land subsidies amounting to over 220,000,000 acres of the public domain, bond subsidies amounting to $——, and interest amounting to $——, to aid in the construction of their several roads; and whereas it is but just and proper that the Government and people should understand the status of such roads and the disposition made by such companies in the construction of their roads of the subsidies granted by the Government: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Judiciary Committee be, and are hereby, instructed and authorized to inquire into and report to this House, first, whether the several railroad companies hereinbefore named or any of them have, in the construction of their railroad and telegraph lines, fully complied with the requirements of law granting money, bond, and land subsidies to aid such companies in the construction of their railroad and telegraph lines; second, whether the several railroad companies or any of them have formed within themselves corporate or construction companies for the purpose of subletting to such corporate or construction companies contracts for building and equipping said roads or any portion thereof, and, if so, whether the money, land, and bond subsidies granted by the Government have been properly applied by said companies or any of them in the construction of their road or roads; third, whether the several railroad companies or any of them have forfeited their land subsidies by failing to construct and equip their road or roads or any portion thereof as required by law; fourth, that for the purpose of making a thorough investigation of the several Pacific railroads, or any of them, the Judiciary Committee shall have full power to send for persons and papers, and, after thorough investigation shall have been made, shall report to this House such measure or bill as will secure to the Government full indemnity for all losses occasioned by fradulent transactions or negligence on the part of such railroad companies or any of them, or on the part of any corporate or construction company, in the expenditure of money, bonds, or interest, or in the disposition of lands donated by the United States for the construction of such roads or any of them or any portion thereof, and for the non-payment of interest lawfully due the Government or any other claim or claims the United States may have against such railroad company or companies.

TERM OF PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, one of the amendments referred to the Judiciary Committee upon the question of a change of the Constitution in regard to the presidential term of office was offered by myself. That joint resolution was very much the same as the one which has been reported by that committee and now under consideration.

I have listened with great pleasure to the arguments which have been made upon both sides of this question and upon both sides of this House. I have thought much over this question before it was argued here to-day, and the result of the arguments here and of my previous reflections only tends to confirm me in the conclusion at which I long since arrived, that is, that the tenure of the Presidency of the United States should be confined to a single term and that term should be four years. I believe that the dangers arising from the increasing patronage in the hands of the President and that the changes that have taken place since the Constitution was adopted render it absolutely necessary that something should be done to stay the evils that are festering upon our body-politic.

The objections which my friend from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on this side of the House and which my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] on the other side of the House urge to the one-term principle seem to be these: first, that the person elected to the Presidency of the United States for but a single term has scarcely learned how to discharge the duties of his office when he is compelled to abandon it; and, secondly, that a second term should be held out as a reward for the services of the incumbent during his first term and as a goal toward which his ambition may stimulate him to a proper discharge of his duties during his first term. These reasons carried out would be an argument for a third or a fourth or even a term for life. For these reasons among others I am opposed to anything but a single term, be it for four or six years. Can it be that this vast country, having grown in importance in the eyes of the world until she now occupies a position if not first at least second to no other nation on earth, must now begin to educate her Presidents by first electing them to that position, instead of selecting statesmen of experience and capacity in the first instance, so that the first term of the Presidency is to be considered but an apprenticeship in which he shall be educated for a second term? Let the people determine that there is but a single term for each President and they will learn to select no man for that office who is not a statesman of experience, capable of discharging the duties of that office in the first instance with honor and profit to the country. Let the people be careful in the selection of the incumbent of this, one of the highest offices in the gift of any people, and feel that their liberties may be endangered by placing an inexperienced person in the discharge of such important duties, and none but the best will be selected. I believe if we have but a single term this desirable end will be greatly promoted.

Sir, we cannot liken the presidential office to the office of Congressman as the gentlemen have done who preceded me. But one man in the nation can fill that office at one time, while there are three hundred men in the nation who do fill the offices that we fill to-day. The inexperience of some is corrected and counteracted by the experience of others, and thus the evils flowing from the inexperience of all is partially if not entirely prevented. It is not to be expected that a man who comes to Congress, it may be at twenty-five years of age, shall be a full-grown statesman. But the man selected to fill the highest place in the gift of this people should be second in experience and statesmanship to no man in the land. Sir, this House may be the arena in which the growing aspirant for presidential honors may prove himself worthy of them. We have marked and remarkable instances before us already of men, not only in this House but at the other end of the Capitol, who are aspiring to this high position. Can it be said to the discredit of these aspirants that they are seeking positions to which they are not equal and that they desire to serve an apprenticeship in the White House for four years in order to fit them for a second term of four years more? Let us understand that we are to place no man in that high position who is not fitted for it in the first instance; let us select none but men capable, honest, and fitted in every possible way for the position the moment they take the reins of government in their hands; let us trust the reins of government to no tyro; let us put them only in the hands of experienced men, and then they will serve four years, not as an apprenticeship, but four years of great usefulness and honor to the country.

But it is said that a second term should be held out as an inducement to the occupant of the office for a first term to discharge the duties of that office with honor to himself and profit to the country in order that he merit the premium of the second term. Is it then to be understood that the people of the United States can place in the presidential chair a man whose honor is of so slight a texture that he may not be induced to the conscientious performance of the sacred duties which his oath and the people have imposed upon him except by extending to him a reward for the discharge of his plain duty? Sir, let us understand that there is to be but one term, and we will place in that position no man who will not discharge his duties from conscientious motives, without hope of reward, except that which may flow from the hearts of a grateful and well-served people. No man who needs a reward of a second term for the proper performance of the duties of his office is fitted in the first instance to fill it at all. Sir, these arguments are freighted with their own refutation. We must make the President of this Republic occupy such a position before the world that no citizen of this or any other country can question either his ability or his integrity.

But, Mr. Speaker, my friend from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has taken up the old debate in the constitutional convention which framed our present Constitution, and from that he has deduced an argument in favor of two terms of four years each. Let me remind the gentleman that the most of the arguments made upon that subject in that convention were when the proposition was under consideration that the President or the Governor, whatever he might be called, should be elected by the Legislature; that is, by the Congress of the United States. Those arguments were all made with reference to the influence of the Legislature upon the President to be elected by them, to the power that they might hold over him. The discussion in the convention extended over a period of three or four months. Some proposed a term of seven years, one proposed a term of three years, others six years, the question of eligibility or ineligibility for a re-election entering into the arguments throughout. The term of four years, with the question of re-eligibility left to the people, was agreed upon as a compromise between the various conflicting sentiments upon that subject then existing in the convention. It was a compromise; there was no question whatever whether there should be one or more terms of office for the same person. That question was left to be determined by the experience of the people in time to come.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. NEW. I would remind him in this connection that Mr. Jefferson, twenty-five years after Washington's first election, expressed himself in favor of a second term with ineligibility to a third; and furthermore Mr. Jefferson had himself served a second term.

Mr. CAULFIELD. That I understand; I was speaking of the debates in the convention. I understand that the letter the gentleman refers to was written long afterward. At the time the convention was held the population of this country was small and the offices to be filled comparatively few. It was impossible for those who were framing that Constitution to look forward a hundred years and see what we now behold around us. Now we have a population of over 40,000,000, instead of the 3,000,000 for which they were legislating at that time. They little foresaw that patronage which would fall under the control of the Presidents who should come after them. They little foresaw that our large cities and our little towns were to be crowded with officeholders of the kind and character now to be seen. They little foresaw that those places would be filled by men selected alone for their capacity to elect a President for a second term rather than for their ability to discharge properly the duties of the offices to which they were assigned.

That is the difficulty now pressing upon us. The President who has before him the possibility of a second term will be induced in his appointments to select men who are wire-workers in politics, men who have but little moral character, who possess but slight ability for the positions to which they are assigned, but who are fitted by a resort to all kinds of political devices to increase the chances of the then incumbent for a second term. They little foresaw that in a hundred years from that time 80,000 office-holders would have much more to do in nominating a man to occupy the seat for the next presidential term and helping to elect him to it than in the discharge of their own official duties.

If men were elected and appointed to positions only because of their capacity to fill them, do you suppose this nation would to-day be looking to Saint Louis and Chicago for the punishment of men who had been placed in position more for their capacity for wire-working and political intrigue than for their integrity and ability to discharge the duties of the offices they have filled?

The Constitution provides that Congress may propose amendments whenever it shall deem it necessary. Now, I admit that we are not to propose amendments simply from mere whim or caprice, or for the purpose of advancing some political and personal design of the proposer, but whenever Congress shall deem it necessary for the public good. It is our sworn duty under the Constitution to propose no amendment unless we deem such amendment necessary and called for by the people. It has been said upon the other side that the people are not calling for this amendment. If I have heard the voice of the people aright, I say that they are calling for an amendment upon this very question. Is such an amendment necessary? If it is important to stop the abuses that are now increasing in our midst, then it is necessary.

The public mind is uneasy at the bare possibility that such a contingency as a third term may happen. Much controversy has arisen upon this subject throughout the country. During the first and second term of the present incumbent the question of eligibility to a succeeding term has been much discussed. The evils of Government have been so rapidly multiplying that the people, who are anxious to maintain the Government in its original simplicity and as far removed as possible from the blandishments of patronage, are seeking for a remedy against the increase of power which the growth of our country and its resources are constantly augmenting in the hands of those who wield it.

The question is, how shall the remedy be applied? I regard the constitutional amendment limiting the tenure of the presidential office to but a single term of four years as one very important step toward securing this end. The incumbent of so high a position should have no stimulant to any other ambition but a strict performance of his duty, by which he will impress an honorable name upon the history of his country. Let him feel that his appointments to office must be from that class of men whose integrity in the discharge of their duties will be of lasting benefit to the country and add luster to his administration, and he will keep an eye single to the appointment of none but honest and capable men to office. But let him feel that he must, in order to secure a second term, make his appointments from that class of politicians whose influence is likely to secure him a second term and their own continuance in office, and the offices of the country will be filled by wire-working politicians, who stop at no means to secure a continuance of power in the hands of their patron and themselves. I believe that if the Presidency was confined to a single term we would see that the efforts of the President would tend in the direction of diminishing the number of office-holders and holding them to a strict and economical discharge of their duties. Under the present system the number of office-holders is so increased out of the class of political wire-workers that no other aid need be invoked for procuring a nomination for the Presidency than that which this large and well-spread army of presidential parasites is ready to furnish. The war and the debt thereby created have furnished for the collection of the various taxes newly imposed large re-enforcements to the standing army of office-holders already in the service of the Government. In adopting means for the collection of the taxes of the Government no regard has been had to the collection of these taxes in the simplest and cheapest manner, but the question has been, how can we adopt means to multiply the number of persons for the collection of these taxes so as to secure the largest number of workers for the Administration and the next term in each district and State in the country?

This, Mr. Speaker, is the evil which this amendment is intended more particularly than anything else to arrest; and if it be arrested we shall have taken a most important step toward the purification of the offices of the country and the diminution of the expenses of the Government, and there will be some chance of our return to the original simplicity and economy which our fathers intended should be a guarantee against the evils which now beset and threaten our Government.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to occupy the attention of the House at any great length in the remarks I shall make on the subject before us. I was not aware of the fact, or at least had forgotten it, that this subject was to be discussed to-day until it was announced from the Chair.

The proposition before us is one of very considerable importance, because it seeks to make a radical change in the fundamental law of the land. I am in favor of the amendment to the Constitution which is proposed by the minority of the Judiciary Committee, and I am opposed to that which is reported by the majority of the committee. I will give in a very few words some reasons which influence me in arriving at the conclusions to which I have come.

What is the proposition of the committee? Allow me to read it It is that—

> No person who has held or shall hereafter hold the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

This proposition embraces two material principles or objects. The first of them will, in my judgment, be utterly ineffectual for any purpose whatever and the second is very objectionable in many respects. What is the first branch of this proposition? It is that no person who has held the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office. So far as that may be applied to any person who has heretofore held or now holds the office of President, it is wholly unnecessary, because neither the present Chief Magistrate nor any citizen who has held that high office is now seeking a re-election to it. If it is aimed at President Grant it is utterly ineffectual for the reason that this amendment to the Constitution cannot by any possibility be adopted before the next presidential election. It therefore can be of no value. It is a mere brutum fulmen, announcing a purpose which can be of no practical utility, one which cannot be carried into effect until it shall have been defeated by the lapse of time. So far, then, as that portion of the amendment proposed by the committee is concerned it is worse than useless, merely vox, et præterea nihil. The amendment proposed by the minority would equally exclude him if it could be adopted before an election.

What next? The second part of this proposed amendment leaves the presidential term at four years, but declares that no person who may hereafter hold the office of President shall ever again be eligible to that office.

Sir, in my judgment, that is very objectionable for several reasons. It has been well said that this will apply to a Vice-President who succeeds to the office of President and holds it for only a month or a day. It has been determined that he becomes a de jure President. And as such, though holding the office of President but for a day, he would, if this amendment be adopted, be rendered ineligible for election. The people might very much and properly desire to elect to this high office a worthy citizen who had been elected to the office of Vice-President, and who for but a brief period had succeeded to the office of President. No reason exists why they should not.

But assuming what would probably be generally the case, that this amendment would only apply to a person who had been elected to the office of President and held it for four years, I regard it still as very objectionable.

There are some things essential to the success of an administration, some so manifestly so that I think there can be no doubt or dispute about them. They are, as I conceive, substantially three: first, that the President in office shall have sufficient time to give an effectual trial to any policy which he or the party elected to power with him may choose to adopt; second, the advantages resulting from experience in the office; and, third, the administration of the office without any personal or selfish motive, as for instance an effort to secure a re-election regardless of the public welfare. These three things are essential to a successful administration of the national Government and to the prosperity and happiness of the people of the country. They are essential to the success of any business undertaking or enterprise. Let an administration come in, backed up by a majority in both branches of Congress, and let it adopt a policy on currency, finance, revenue, no matter what; if you limit the term of its power to four years, with ineligibility to re-election, you have no stability in your measures of policy, but constant change all the time—change always detrimental to the public interests. Four years do not give the time necessary to establish a policy of government and thoroughly test it on any great measure. People will not fully embark in commercial, manufacturing, and other enterprises on a system of laws or policy which is likely to change in every period of four years. Extend it to six and its wisdom will be so firmly established that it cannot be changed or its folly will be so fully demonstrated that it cannot demand a new lease of power to further test it. The public peace demands a permanent government; the interests of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures are always interrupted by sudden or radical changes in finance, currency, or revenue laws affecting them.

And then, sir, it is very desirable we should have in the office of President the advantage of experience. In every office within the gift of the people experience is desirable, and it must be especially so in the high office of President, as well as in legislative and other offices of the Government. This has always been regarded as valuable in this Hall. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] has demonstrated this. The people of the South before the war understood it, and had largely the advantage of the North, because they kept their Representatives in Congress long in office. The people of the East understand this and they, too, profit by it. The people everywhere are beginning to learn it. But this plan of limiting the presidential term to four years, with ineligibility to re-election, proposes to throw away all of the advantages which might result from the means I have indicated for giving success to the administration of a President. For the reasons, then, which I have stated, and others I might mention, I regard the amendment proposed by the majority of the Judiciary Committee as very objectionable. It would be vastly better to leave the Constitution as it is than change it as proposed.

The experience of our country has demonstrated the wisdom of securing a party in power for more than four years. If during the war of the rebellion you had made the President ineligible to a re-election, it might have been fatal to our national existence, fatal to all the great interests of the Republic. A new administration would have brought a change of policy, and this could not have failed to be disastrous. During the war we had a presidential election. It was unfortunate it was so. The party out of power hoped to get in by a change of the policy of the administration. This encouraged those in arms against the Government. It prolonged the war. It would have been better if the presidential term had been six years. That would have given time to bring the war to a close without the contest over a presidential election. Then the energies of the people would have been directed to one great object, for the policy of the Administration was settled, and its success required time uninterrupted by the distractions of party contests. Any policy of government in war or in peace requires all this. For these and other reasons I might name I am opposed to the amendment recommended by the committee.

Now what is the amendment proposed by the minority of the committee as a substitute for that of the majority? I will read it:

From and after the 4th day of March, in the year 1885, the term of office of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be six years; and any person having been elected to and held the office of President, or who, for two years, has held such office, shall be ineligible to a re-election.

The change which is sought to be made by this amendment is in brief to fix the presidential term at six years with the feature of ineligibility to re-election.

Now, sir, what are the advantages of having a President to hold his office for six years? I have already stated some of them. I will not now attempt to enumerate all of them, but will state some particulars in which I conceive this is an improvement upon the present term of office. In the first place, then, terms of six years would save the interruption of business, the trouble, the expense, the excitement of presidential elections as frequently as we now have them. Secondly, a six-years term would give the advantage derived from the experience of each successive year for six years absolutely, without the possibility of interruption as now at the end of four years.

Thirdly, it would aid in avoiding the greatest danger our system of government is liable to encounter. The greatest danger of our present system lies in or may grow out of the mode of declaring the result of the returns of a presidential election. This is the weak point in our system. The votes of the electoral colleges of the several States are sent up and counted by the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of the two Houses. It happens sometimes that there is a question as to whether the vote of this or that State shall be received. On one occasion it was made a question whether the electoral vote of Wisconsin should be received, because the electors of that State, in consequence of a snow-storm, were unable to meet and cast the electoral vote on the day fixed by law. Within my experience it was made a question whether the vote of Louisiana should be counted in the presidential election. At one time the question was made as to whether the electoral vote of Missouri should be counted. Fortunately the result would not have been changed, no matter what might have been the determination of the convention of the two Houses in the particular cases where questions arose as to whether the votes of those States should be received. It is not precisely clear what power the convention of the two Houses has in passing on these questions, or whether the Houses shall act jointly or separately on them. But suppose, sir, your President is eligible and a candidate for re-election, and the joint convention of the two Houses throws out the vote of a State or refuses to receive it, and the President in office insists they did wrong and that he has been elected. Then, sir, being in office, he has the Army and Navy and a host of retainers at his back, all ready to stand by him in declaring, in defiance of the result as announced by the joint convention of the two Houses, that he is the President. Here is presented a great danger which may result in civil war. God grant that it may never co :e. That is a good reason why the President should not be eligible to re-election, so that he should not have this inducement to defy the result as declared by the joint convention of the two Houses. As I have already remarked, that is the weak point in our system, and there is indeed much more necessity for an amendment of the Constitution to remedy that, the most dangerous feature of our system, than to remedy the evil which this amendment proposes to remedy. And I trust before this Congress shall adjourn something will be done to relieve our system of the danger which threatens us from the sources to which I have alluded.

But a fourth reason for making the presidential term six years is that it will relieve the virulence of party spirit. We now hold a presidential election every four years, and this event is always attended with excitement; the business of the country is interrupted, parties are arrayed against each other advocating different policies, and while the uncertainty lasts as to which policy shall prevail the business of the country is largely interrupted. The earnest and sometimes bitter contests over political principles, and, if you please, the scramble for the more than seventy thousand offices in this country, sometimes may be liable to enkindle a spirit of hatred and party rancor and virulence not desirable even if not fearful to contemplate. It is desirable that the people should be relieved from all these things as much as possible. If we make the presidential term six years, the bitterness and strife engendered by a presidential contest will die out and will rarely ever be revived, at least not so fully as when kept alive by presidential elections occurring every four years. Reason, calm, reflecting judgment, rather, will take the place of mere party contests. The country will find repose, and good government and morality will come to reward the change. I believe in political parties organized in manly, honorable, and intelligent contest over principles which are really debatable among statesmen and political economists. But when they go beyond this and seek success by excitement and passion rather than reason, they are dangerous to good government and to civil liberty. The proposed amendment would contribute to organize the rule of reason rather than the reign of party spirit and passion.

There are advantages in a term of six years which you cannot have in a term of four years. As I have already remarked, a President in office, like every other officer of the Government, learns by experience. Six years will give him time to settle not only an internal policy for the country but one with all foreign nations, and in that respect the extension of the presidential term will be of great advantage. But I have no time fully to discuss the question as to the expediency of extending the term to six years. I think I have said enough; I think I have presented sufficient reasons to the House for extending the presidential term to six years.

Another feature of this proposition of the minority of the Judiciary Committee is ineligibility to re-election after the term of six years. This, I conceive, will be attended with some advantages, and I will state in brief, without going into detail fully, some of the reasons why it is in my judgment desirable that the President after holding office for six years should be ineligible to re-election.

Among the advantages of ineligibility will be these: First, it will relieve the President of the care of a re-election, and will enable him to devote his time exclusively to the public interests; second, it will remove all temptation to use the patronage of the Government to secure support from those who are in office or to influence the public judgment in his behalf; third, it will remove the inducement to extend the patronage by law, with a view to command additional influence to enable the President to secure a re-election; fourth, it will remove from the President the restraint which he otherwise would be under in recommending a reduction of patronage and a reduction of the expenses of the Government.

In all these respects he will be perfectly free to act upon his own unbiased judgment, with no personal motive, no object in view, but to secure the common good of the whole country. The anxiety for a re-election will give place to a desire to go down in history as the benefactor of his country and mankind. I conceive, sir, that these are sufficient reasons for this feature of ineligibility. Why, sir, we all know that the result of a presidential contest may depend upon the vote of a single State; and the vote of a single State may depend upon the vote of a single city. And the administration may have power to throw into that city immense patronage, corrupting where it goes, influencing the public judgment, buying all corrupt enough to be bought, holding out promises to those who may seek for future office, as well as those who are in office. By all these means an administration may bring the immense power and patronage of the Government to bear upon the result of a presidential election. The temptation to use it may become very great. "Lead us not into temptation" is a prayer so essential to human nature that its divine origin is manifest. Let us so write the Constitution now that a President in office will scarcely have need to utter it so far as the improper use of patronage is concerned.

Sir, I have no time to discuss this subject fully, but we all know from our past history that the power and patronage of the Government have been employed exactly for these purposes. We know at least as far back as the time of President Van Buren that the corruptions which were festering under his administration were systematically covered up, concealed from the people, and public officials guilty of public robbery were shielded, lest their exposure might be detrimental to the presidential prospects of Mr. Van Buren when a candidate for re-election in 1840. Sir, I speak this in no party sense, but with the hope that all parties may take warning by this part of our history, and that we may in future shun the evils which have been shown to exist in the past.

These are evils the magnitude of which could not have been foreseen by the framers of the Constitution. Our growth as a people has been the marvel of history. With it offices have multiplied, until it has become a serious question how far it is safe to give the power of appointment substantially to the control of one man. And now we are met with the question whether we should not write in the Constitution a provision which will hold out no inducement to a President to retain bad or incompetent men in office, but make it an object to remove them when the public good may require, with no fear as to the consequences.

I have been asked by a gentleman why it is proposed in this amendment that it shall only be applied from and after the 4th day of March in the year 1885. I will state in a very few words the reason for this. Indeed it has perhaps already been sufficiently done, I think, by my colleague on the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.] This amendment we all know cannot be adopted before the next presidential election. If it should be made applicable to the President to be elected this year, extending his term to six years, the party who in the next election should be defeated would vote solid against adopting it in order that they might have an opportunity to succeed, if possible, in a new election at the end of four years.

As it requires the assent of three-fourths of the States to adopt the amendment, we all know it cannot be adopted by any one political party. We desire to put it in a shape that no political party or administration shall oppose it on grounds of present or temporary expediency. We desire success as a means of securing a great reform in the Constitution.

If the amendment should leave the President to be elected this year to hold a term of four years only, with ineligibility to a re-election, he and all his political friends would oppose it in the hope of securing a re-election. This would be fatal to the amendment. These in brief are the reasons why this provision is put into the amendment as to the time when it shall take effect.

The words of this proposition have been carefully considered. I can speak from my personal knowledge on this subject. They have been written in a form to secure the desired object without encountering unnecessary opposition from any source. I have given to the words employed no little consideration in their preparation, and I believe they are free from all objection if the principle they embody shall be found correct.

Now, I have given some of the reasons which induce me to vote against the amendment reported by the majority of the committee and in favor of that submitted by the minority. It seems to me they are sufficient. This is a subject worthy of the gravest and most mature deliberation. Every change of the fundamental law ought to command our most serious and thoughtful consideration. Especially should this be so when it relates to the highest office in the gift of the people. If the proposed amendment should be adopted, it will make a material, a vital change in our Constitution. I have taken occasion in a few hurried words to present this subject to the House, and I hope it will receive the consideration which its importance demands and which the people we represent have a right to expect at our hands.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not intend to make many remarks. The line of argument that I should have pursued has been so completely exhausted by my friend from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] that I feel indisposed to say more than a few words; and I shall say those for the purpose of having a recommittal of the subject to the committee, that they may report back an amendment to the Constitution, coupling with it an amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY,] taking from the President the patronage now belonging to his high office.

I dislike exceedingly to differ from a committee, especially when the majority of that committee is from this side of the House. But, sir, I believe that that committee has mistaken the feelings of the people when it comes here with a recommendation for a term of office for the President lasting only four years. The very grave objection to a second election of the President will be existing still. Every four years since you and I can remember, sir, the business of the country has been jeopardized by the presidential election, by the intense excitement engendered by it, and the consequent demoralization. The excitement, however, is not the only ground of this demoralization. It grows also out of the uncertainty in regard to the policy of the incoming Presidency. Financial men, men of means, are indisposed to put their money in commercial schemes or any other enterprises when they do not know what the policy of the Administration may be in the course of a few months. For, sir, you remember, and all of us remember, that it is a constant expression during every presidential year, "O, the good times will come when the presidential election is over."

Now, sir, I think that what we ought to attempt now is to answer the call of the people and get rid of this excitement and this uncertainty. A term of four years will not do it.

As I said, I do not intend to make any extended remarks, because I am simply going over the ground which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. McCRARY] has so fully covered, but I wish to say to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary that it is impossible to pass his amendment making the term for four years; but he can pass a resolution fixing the term at six years. There are, however, some points in the minority report not wholly acceptable to this side of the House. What we want is an amendment acceptable to two-thirds of this House, and which we may hope to be acceptable to the people of the country.

I would therefore move to recommit the whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary to report at an early day, hoping that they will report an amendment making the term six years instead of four.

Mr. COX. I would inquire if the gentleman from Illinois has the floor to make that motion now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, [Mr. ELY.] The Chair understands that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] was that the session this afternoon should be confined to discussion only.

Mr. HARRISON. I recall the motion. I did not mean to make the motion now. I will make it to-morrow. I merely suggested that that motion will be made.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I had not expected to participate in this debate until a few moments ago, and especially not at this hour, when the House presents a beggarly array of empty benches, and I would not ask consent to occupy the floor for a few minutes at this unfortunate hour were it not for the fact that I feel that the importance of this proposition to change our fundamental law touching the highest office in the nation warrants me in presenting to the House very briefly the reasons which will control my action, and which, I think, ought to control the action of the House when the vote is called, and were it not for the further reason that a further reply, in my judgment, is demanded than what has been made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to the senseless third-term outcry which has led to the offering of this amendment. For the purpose of making that reply, I ask for a few moments the attention of the House.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he would not prefer to yield for a motion to adjourn; the usual hour for adjournment has come.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I would gladly yield but for the fact that, as I understand the order of debate to-day, by so doing I should lose entirely my right to the floor to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Under the order made before this debate was commenced this afternoon, the privilege was conceded to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to take the floor to-morrow after the morning hour and move the previous question, and that would cut off the gentleman's right to be heard.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed to proceed after the morning hour—for how long?

Mr. WOODWORTH. Fifteen or twenty minutes will suffice.

Mr. McCRARY. I ask unanimous consent that he be allowed to proceed for twenty minutes, and if that consent be granted I will move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair inquires whether the House is now willing to give consent that the gentleman from Ohio, who has the floor upon this subject, shall be permitted to-morrow at the close of the morning hour to occupy the attention of the House in the further discussion of this measure for twenty minutes, and that then the right of the gentleman from Kentucky to move the previous question shall attach?

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. McCRARY. I move that the House adjourn.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Pending the motion to adjourn, leave of absence was granted to Mr. JENKS for one week, on account of important business; to Mr. BLISS for one week, on account of important business; and to Mr. DOBBINS for one week, on account of sickness.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. VAN VORHES to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the cases of Henry M. Davis and Peter M. Ward.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania, to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Dorathy Irons, mother of Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to Mr. COX to withdraw from the files of the House the petition in the case of B. L. Britton.

The question was then taken on Mr. McCRARY'S motion to adjourn, and it was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. G. A. BAGLEY: Papers relating to the claim of John C. Duff, to the Committee on War Claims.

Nolen, Thomas T. Somerville, Henry O. Sykes, and Robert Talley, for a rehearing of their claims rejected by the claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the petition of Benjamin C. Card, praying that the date of his commission as major and quartermaster in the United States Army be corrected; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the county commissioners and various other officers of Johnson County, in the State of Kansas, praying for action that will settle the titles to that portion of the Shawnee Indian reservation lying in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Kansas, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Ellis, Kansas, to Orleans, Nebraska; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. WALLACE presented the petition of John S. McMillan, of Pennsylvania, praying compensation for extrahazardous service and for confirmation of an award heretofore made; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of R. N. Eddy, late lieutenant of the One hundred and fourteenth Regiment of New York Volunteers, praying the passage of an act for his relief; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of 250 citizens of Winnebago County, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation for the speedy completion of the Fox River improvement, and also for the construction of a canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City, Wisconsin, to the Mississippi River, in accordance with the third plan recommended to the Government by Major-General Warren, of the United States Engineer Corps; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a number of petitions of residents of Cleveland, Ohio, praying an early repeal of so much of the act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, as provides for the payment of United States legal-tender notes in coin upon the 1st day of January, 1879, and so much of the said act as authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to sell and dispose of the bonds of the United States for the purpose of enabling him to redeem such legal-tender notes; and representing that in their judgment the existing law will be disastrous to the leading interests of the country. While I do not agree with the request of these petitioners, I know many of them to be of high character, whose views are worthy of consideration. I move that these petitions be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH presented a petition of H. Killam & Co., and 170 other citizens of New Haven, Connecticut, praying for the issue of fifty-year 3.65 gold-bearing bonds; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, requesting the same modifications of the laws of the United States for the ports of Saint Paul and Du Luth as are now extended to other ports in various States; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the vexatious delays and expenses incident to the appraisal of foreign goods at the Atlantic ports of the United States, more especially at the port of New York, have prevented the proper development of the legitimate trade appertaining to the designated ports of entry and delivery of the State of Minnesota, which embargo has been obviated by statute enactment of the United States, so far as the ports of Evansville, (Indiana,) Milwaukee, (Wisconsin,) &c., are concerned: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Minnesota be requested to urge a modification of the law of the United States, so that the privileges accorded to certain enumerated ports in the various States by sections 2990, 2991, and 2997, Revised Statutes of the United States, be extended to the ports of Saint Paul and Du Luth in this State.

Resolved further, That the secretary of state be requested to forward a copy of these resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

W. R. KINYON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
J. B. WAKEFIELD,
President of the Senate.

Approved January 25, A. D. 1876.

J. S. PILLSBURY,
Governor.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State, this 27th day of January, A. D. 1876.

J. S. IRGENS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. McMILLAN. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, or some early day, I shall introduce a bill in pursuance of the request of the Legislature of Minnesota.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of the Legislature of Arkansas in favor of the passage of a law authorizing the district attorney of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas to investigate and settle on legal and equitable terms, under the direction of the Solicitor of the Treasury, the account between the United States and the sureties of the late Peter T. Crutchfield, of Little Rock, Arkansas, formerly United States designated depositary at that place, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 361) to provide for the payment of claims for Indian depredations, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations; which was agreed to.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. LOGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 394) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for furnishing trusses to disabled soldiers," approved May 28, 1872; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. McCREERY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of Ben Alsop be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. In accordance with the notice given last Thursday I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 2, to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Louisiana, and Florida.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It repeals section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, confining the disposal of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida to the provisions of the homestead law.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, it is hardly to be expected that a bill of this character, which does not bear upon its face its full purposes, can be passed this morning without some explanation. I will therefore ask the attention of the Senate for a short time for that purpose.

Prior to June 21, 1866, the land laws of the United States were of a general nature, applying to the citizens of all the States and Territories alike. On that day Congress passed an act of a special nature, whereby the citizens of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and such other citizens as might desire to enter the public lands in those States, were restricted in doing so to the provisions of the homestead laws; or, in other words, they were denied the privileges and benefits of all the other land laws of the United States under the liberal provisions of which other citizens were allowed to purchase from the public domain. These restrictions are still in force, and are contained in section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows:

> All the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida shall be disposed of in no other manner than according to the terms and stipulations contained in the preceding provisions of this chapter.

The preceding provisions referred to in this section is that portion of the Revised Statutes which embraces the homestead legislation in force when the act of 1866 was passed and which had not been repealed up to the time of the revision. The object of this bill is simply to repeal this section, and thus restore the public lands in the States therein enumerated to the same condition of the other public lands, and to the citizens of those States the same privileges accorded to other citizens by the land laws of the United States.

The question has arisen in my mind, and doubtless will arise in the minds of other Senators, why these restrictions were imposed in the first place. To that I cannot give a satisfactory answer, but have been told by a gentleman who participated in the legislation that its purpose was to more effectually secure homes from the public lands in the States referred to, to the freedmen. Why the public lands in these particular States, so notoriously barren and unfit for farming purposes, should have been selected for restriction while such vast areas of fertile Government lands in other portions of the country were excluded, I cannot understand. Why Arkansas and not Missouri? If it was for the benefit of the freedmen, there were freedmen in the latter State as well as the former. I can only account for it, Mr. President, upon presumption that, there being no one in Congress at that time to represent these five States, the unequal bearing of the law was not brought to the attention of Congress; but be that as it may, no matter what the reasons may have been at that time, I think I can safely assert that no good reason exists now why this provision of law so unequal in its application should longer continue in force, but upon the other hand I think I can give several good reasons why it should not.

Mr. President, all congressional legislation which deprives the citizens of one State from the exercise of privileges which the citizens of other States under similar circumstances are permitted to enjoy is vicious. I think that proposition needs only to be stated in this Chamber to be accepted as an axiom of government. And yet section 2303 of the Revised Statutes does that very thing, as I shall proceed to show.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Arkansas a question, with his permission.

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask whether the Senator understands that under the existing law no title can be acquired to any public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida except under the provisions of the homestead act?

Mr. CLAYTON. I understand that to be so, and it is so. I think I can safely say that no lands can be acquired in those States except under the provisions of the homestead law. Take the case of a citizen living in Missouri, say five hundred yards north of the line dividing Arkansas from that State. If he desires to add a tract of Government land to his farm, if that land has before been offered for sale, he can do so by going to a local land office and paying a dollar and a quarter an acre for it; while his neighbor, living just south of the Arkansas line, who desires to do the same thing under the same circumstances, is debarred from doing so by the operation of this law.

I will put a case entirely free from any agricultural features. A citizen of Missouri who has found a tract of Government land valuable for its timber only, upon which he may desire to erect a mill for the manufacture of lumber or wooden ware, can purchase that tract by applying at the land office, as before stated; but if his neighbor in Arkansas, under similar circumstances, desires to engage in the same laudable pursuit he is estopped by the law we now seek to repeal.

But these are not the only restrictions that bear unfavorably upon the citizens of those States. Citizens outside of those particular five States who may be the holders of soldiers' land warrants, agricultural scrip, or any of the other scrip issued by the Government and made receivable for the purchase of public lands, may locate those warrants and scrips upon any of the public lands outside of these States which have heretofore been offered for sale, while citizens in these five States who may be similar holders of this class of warrants and scrip must either sell them to speculators or they must abandon their own States and go into other States more favored by the law. These statements which I have made indicate how individual hardship may arise under this law. I will now try to show how the States themselves are affected by it. And here I will say that these five States are comparatively old States of this Union, and these lands in question have been in the market for upward of fifty years. During all that time they have been subjected to the different land laws enacted from time to time; among others, to the operations of the graduation act.

So you will see, Mr. President, that lands which have been in the market without a purchaser for fifty years, and which in 1860 could not find a purchaser at the low sum of twelve and a half cents an acre, are not that class of lands which settlers are looking for to make homes on. The fact is, as Senators in this Chamber can attest who are familiar with the character of these lands, that nine-tenths of them are unfit for agricultural purposes. They are only valuable for the timber upon them.

Mr. President, it is a wise provision of Providence that has reserved certain portions of the earth's surface to the exclusive growth of timber. Were that not so, man in his near-sightedness would destroy the equilibrium existing between the agricultural and the timber resources. These lands in question are timber lands, and must always remain so. I know this is especially so of those located in Arkansas. I will here state that the area of timbered lands in that State held by the General Government, and the bulk of which must be held forever if the Government waits for men to make farms on them, amounts to one-fourth of the entire area of that State.

It is well known, Mr. President, that in some of the Western States the value of timber products is very great—take your own State, for instance, the State of Michigan. In that State the value of the lumber product amounts to nearly one-half of the entire products arising from agriculture, including stock. Now, what would be thought in that State of a policy which would shut out this vast field of productive labor and hold it in the Government? The people of that State would naturally complain loudly and justly.

Mr. President, what we ask is that the same privilege to develop these timber resources be accorded to these five States that is accorded to the other States of the Union. Arkansas is a timber State, as I before said. It lies on the eastern boundary of that vast prairie region which extends to the Pacific Ocean. That country is fast filling up with settlers. They want our timber, and we would gladly supply them with it.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask the Senator if there is any quantity of the public land in Arkansas that is of such a character that it would be likely to be taken up by homestead settlers?

Mr. CLAYTON. I have said that the public lands which have been left after fifty years of culling out on the part of settlers, and which have been offered at twelve and a half cents an acre, are not of that character which are capable of agriculture; and this accounts for the fact that the colored men have not settled on these lands. The colored men of the South have been raised to agricultural pursuits; they know the value of good lands as well as white men do, and they are not foolish enough to spend their hard earnings in the vain attempt to make productive by tillage lands which are utterly unproductive except for the growth of timber. Hence they have not availed themselves to any extent of the privileges of this homestead law, for the simple reason that there are no lands left in those States which offer inducements for them to settle upon.

What we ask, Mr. President, is that the people of Arkansas, of Alabama, of Mississippi, of Louisiana, and of Florida may have the privilege of developing the timber resources in their States the same as other Western States have. The only argument that I have heard against the passage of this bill is that if you remove these restrictions speculators will rush in and purchase the lands in large bodies. I do not think that is a danger that exists to any alarming extent. But suppose they should do so, what then? In the first place, they must pay into the Treasury of the United States the value of the lands, and it is not to be denied that the Treasury is sorely in need of the money. In the second place, they must pay every year into the treasury of the States the taxes levied upon these lands, and I regret to say that taxation in those States is very heavy, and that the State treasuries are very much in need of the money.

Mr. NORWOOD. What is the Government price of the lands?

Mr. CLAYTON. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. The worst that could arise would be the danger of individuals holding these lands out of the market. Suppose they do; that is the very thing the General Government is doing to-day. The passage of this bill will add to the wealth of the citizens of the States; furnish productive labor to their citizens; bring immigration to these States; open up a means of supplying the vast prairie land west of us with lumber, and allow the States the privilege of levying a tax on these lands, which are now of no benefit to them, but rather an obstacle in the way of their development.

Mr. MAXEY. Will the Senator from Arkansas permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. CLAYTON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXEY. I understand him to state, first, that these lands under the present public land laws can only be entered under the homestead law?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is so.

Mr. MAXEY. And, second, that very much the larger part of these lands are wholly unfit for homestead purposes?

Mr. CLAYTON. That is so.

Mr. MAXEY. And, third, that these lands cannot be absorbed by land warrants or any other valid claim?

Mr. CLAYTON. They cannot, except under the homestead act.

Mr. MAXEY. The Government, therefore, is subject to have the timber on these lands depredated upon, because they are not fit for homestead purposes and cannot be used for other purposes.

Mr. CLAYTON. I was going to come to that idea. As I before said, the only argument against removing these restrictions that I have heard is that speculators may come in and buy up these lands in large bodies. Then I say in that event, which is the worst view of the case, they will have to pay into the Treasury of the United States the money and the Government gets the benefit of that.

Mr. SHERMAN. How much an acre?

Mr. CLAYTON. One dollar and twenty-five cents an acre. They will have to pay into the State treasury every year taxes on the lands, and the State gets the benefit of that, and its citizens to this extent are correspondingly relieved from taxation. If they hold them from market, they will only be doing that which the Government is now doing. Now suppose these restrictions are not removed, what then? The Government gets no benefit from the lands. The State gets no benefit from them, but they are a hinderance in the way of development. The citizen who is seeking for a homestead gets no benefit from the lands because they are unfit for agricultural purposes. The yearly fires that sweep over these timber lands and are so destructive, will continue to destroy them, and dishonest men will continue to depredate upon them without paying anything to the Government for them. It is well known that Government property of this character receives less attention than individual property; for what is everybody's business is nobody's business. Let these lands go into the hands of individuals and they will have an interest to prevent the destruction of the timber by fire and otherwise.

Mr. JONES, of Florida. Mr. President, the State which I have the honor in part to represent is very deeply interested in this measure. It seems to me to be entirely just and proper. All that has been said by the Senator from Arkansas meets with my entire approbation. I have seen something of the practical working of the present law. There is no State, perhaps, now subject to that law that can display the want of wisdom in it more than my own. This law was professedly enacted to tie up the public lands in certain States for the purpose of giving to the freedmen of the South the privilege of settling upon them by homestead entry. Now, how has this law operated? The lands which belong to the Government of the United States in the State of Florida are barren. But a small portion of the public lands there is fit for cultivation. This is certainly true of my section of the State which is the chief lumber region of the South. There is hardly an acre that is fit for the purpose of cultivation in West Florida.

Under the present law no title can be obtained inside of five years. Our country there is filling up with enterprising gentlemen from the North and from the East and from the West, gentlemen who have been reared in the lumber business, who are acquainted with it; and we feel a very decided interest in the development of this great interest in our State. It is very natural for that class of people to desire to purchase these lands. They are only valuable for timber purposes; and under the present system the trespasser and the trespasser alone has the advantage. The honest man cannot go into the market and buy them. He who desires to make a permanent settlement cannot go there and get a title at once, but he has to sit down five years and take all the risks and contingencies incident to life before he can acquire a title to any land in those States. That is not calculated to build up a State. In order to facilitate improvement and immigration we must have a system by which the settler can obtain at once a title to the land. It is folly for gentlemen to say that this law of 1866 was intended to facilitate settlements when we know by its workings that it has been the greatest obstacle to settlements that we have had to contend with.

Sir, it is well known to gentlemen on this floor who come from my section of the country that the colored people of the South have changed not their original domicile from where they were at the time of their emancipation. They were found at that time, we know, occupying the large productive regions of the South; they were on the large plantations, and they are there yet, and if you will just take a look at the statistics of my own State you will find that the entire voting colored population of that State is to be found in as many counties as you can enumerate on the fingers of your hand. Therefore all the vast unappropriated lands belonging to the Government are not in those counties; they are too poor for these people to cultivate them, and they will not cultivate them. They will not go into the pine regions; they prefer to remain in the large, wealthy, rich counties, and to lease lands there rather than to go down into the piny woods and use mechanical methods of improving the soil. They will not do that, and hence all this vast region is lying there at the mercy of depredators and trespassers. The Government is getting no advantage whatever from it, and honest people are prevented from acquiring it in an honest way.

The returns of the land offices show how this law has worked. I read the other day a report, I think from one of the local land offices in Louisiana, in which it was stated that this law had a very bad effect upon the settlement of the public lands in that State, and the officer in charge of the office there urged the Commissioner to use every effort in his power to bring about its repeal. So far as the State of Florida is concerned, I have this to say in regard to the injustice of this law: When Florida was admitted to the Union in 1845 she made a compact with the General Government in regard to the public lands of that State. The act admitting her into the Union provided that the State should relinquish forever its right to tax the public lands there, provided the Government would agree to pay to the State 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sales of those lands, to be appropriated for school purposes. I take the ground that this Government has violated its compact by withdrawing the entire body of the public lands from sale, and saying to the State, "The disposition of them under the homestead law is no sale which will entitle you to claim the fund." I will say here, Mr. President, that I have very high authority for the assertion that when the General Government becomes a landed proprietor she has no right to claim that her lands shall be exempt from taxation by the States unless those lands are set off for some of the objects and purposes described in the Constitution. This, sir, was the opinion of Mr. Sumner, expressed many years ago in debate here, that every foot of public lands owned by the General Government within the States of this Union was, on principles of law and equity, liable to be taxed for the support of the local institutions and governments of the States; and, if this were not so, why was it that in almost every act of admission by which the new States were admitted into the Union it was required as a condition to their admission that they should relinquish their right of taxation? It would have been folly to ask for a relinquishment of that which did not exist. The Government in nearly every case required that when a State asked for admission into the Union she should give up this great power of taxation so far as it might be sought to apply it to the public domain of the United States. In the case of Florida this language was used in the act of admission:

That in consideration of the concessions made by the State of Florida in respect to the public lands, there be granted to the said State eight entire sections of land for the purpose of fixing their seat of government; also, section No. 16 in every township, or other lands equivalent thereto, for the use of the inhabitants of such township, for the support of public schools; also, two entire townships of land, in addition to the two townships already reserved, for the use of two seminaries of learning—one to be located east, and the other west of the Suwannee River; also, 5 per cent. of the net proceeds of the sale of lands within said State, which shall be hereafter sold by Congress, after deducting all expenses incident to the same; and which said net proceeds shall be applied by said State for the purposes of education.

What did Florida do to call for this stipulation on the part of the General Government?

Said State of Florida shall embrace the territories of East and West Florida, which, by the treaty of amity, settlement, and limits between the United States and Spain, on the 22d day of February, 1819, were ceded to the United States.

* * * * * * *

Said States of Iowa and Florida are admitted into the Union on the express condition that they shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands lying within them, nor levy any tax on the same while remaining the property of the United States.

"In consideration of the concessions made by the State of Florida." Can the language of compact be more explicit than that, recognizing the right of the State to relinquish this power? The General Government says that, in consideration of the concessions made by the State, it hereby pledges to her 5 per centum of the proceeds of the sale of public lands in that State. How has this compact been kept? It is indicated by the law on your statute-book, by withdrawing every acre of public land there from sale and requiring that if it be disposed of at all it can only be done under the terms of the homestead law; and when we go to-day to the Department and ask for the 5 per cent. which the compact guarantees, we are told that this is not a sale. I say that this would not be creditable in the case of individuals. Here is a solemn undertaking on the part of the Government which I ask you to fulfill by restoring these lands to market and putting them upon the same footing as the lands of the great West stand to-day.

The duties and burdens of these State governments with regard to education are very great, and nothing can be more appropriate than that this State and the others should have the benefit of this compact and this fund for building up and sustaining a school system there.

I have heard nothing said against this bill which ought in my opinion to prevent its receiving the sanction of this body. Look at Florida, with a territorial area greater than the State of New York, and only 187,000 inhabitants. Will you tell me that there is not room there for the operation of the pre-emption system and every other system which is calculated to build up a State? These lands will lie there forever, as the Senator from Arkansas has said, unless they are cut loose from the present law and the same principles of entry and acquisition be extended to them that now apply to the other land States of the Union.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I remember very well when the act passed which it is now proposed to repeal, and I believe it was universally thought in Congress at that time that we were making a very wise and beneficent measure for the great body of the people, particularly the colored people, in those five States where there was a great deal of unappropriated public land and a very large proportion of colored population who would wish to get homesteads and who had no money to buy by pre-emption or at public sales; for the substance of this section which it is now proposed to repeal simply is, taking it in its connection with the context, that in those five States situated in that way with large amounts of public lands, timbered and fertile, as well as barren in some places, of course there was a very large proportion of the population desirous of obtaining homesteads, which it would be for the interest of the Government in every point of view that they should do. This act provided that they could obtain these lands in small bodies by homestead settlements, and that they should not be crowded out by having public sales and then pre-emption rights under which the whole body of these lands might fall at a very cheap price into the hands of large holders, sometimes called speculators, and others, and thus deprive the poor and weak populations of these States of the benefit of the homestead laws. That was the philosophy upon which this act passed; and I remember it struck me at the time, as it evidently did a majority of both Houses of Congress, as being a most beneficent and humane measure.

Now, it is proposed to repeal it, and to turn what there is left of the public lands in these States over to the common effect of the statutes prevailing in other States about the disposition of public lands, under which, as we all know, much injury has been done to the States of the great West, as they have been very properly called, by speculators getting hold of large tracts of land, to say nothing of grants to corporations of large tracts, who hold them in one form or another much longer, it may be, than the statute intended they should, in restraining immigration and stopping the filling up of good lands with settlers.

This law as it stands simply does not open to sale at a dollar and a quarter an acre these fertile lands and these lands covered with timber which are worth, really, by and by, a great deal more, as timber is growing scarcer and scarcer in this country, to purchasers who, buying at public sale, can buy in unlimited quantities, locate bounty-land warrants upon them, and all the thousand ways that are known to northern and western people of, as they say, out West, "scooping" —I believe that is the expression—large bodies of land, and then holding them for a rise, for speculative purposes. That sort of thing does not do the community in which the lands are any sort of good; it does not do the public any good, because the actual amount of revenue derived from these public sales is of course very small. The dollar and a quartar an acre is all that is ever given at an auction, as a general rule, though there may be exceptions.

It appears to me that we ought to consider very seriously the bearings that it may have, before we enter on this legislation. I have not noticed any petitions presented from the poor people or other people of these five States, representing that this law works a hardship to their home interests in excluding speculators and inviting homestead settlers upon these lands. I know it has been suggested that the timber upon these lands is being carried off by thieves. Well, the timber will be carried off by thieves just as fast with this new law as it will as the law now stands. I take it the timber thief, as he is called, would be just as willing, unless he was a very patriotic man, to take timber from the land of a private owner who lived somewhere else as he would from Government land. But I do not put large reliance upon the extent to which these Government lands are being denuded of their timber by the wrongful intrusion of trespassers. Undoubtedly, if you were to aggregate it all together, a good deal of timber would have been lost; but if in any particular locality that sort of thing is carried on to any extent, then it is high time we have an inquiry into the character and behavior of the officers who administer justice and execute the laws of the United States in such quarters. The penalties for taking timber without authority of law from the public lands are ready and are sufficiently severe, and the Government provides the machinery for enforcing those penalties by grand juries, by marshals, by district attorneys, by judges, by all the machinery of protective and retributory justice; and therefore, if, in any of these States this timber-thieving really amounts to any noticeable quantity, certainly it either ought to be prosecuted or we ought to have some officers who would prosecute it and stop it.

But apart from that, Mr. President, I think we ought to make haste slowly in taking these lands, as in substance we do, away from the homestead people, who, from their previous want of education and knowledge of the affairs of this world, must emerge slowly from their unhappy condition, and putting them in a posture where, when they begin gradually to go forward and take up their little homesteads, they shall find that all the land which is good for anything is owned by some Vermonter or New Yorker or somebody who has bought it for a speculation.

I move, therefore, as the subject has now been opened for our consideration, that the bill be postponed until to-morrow, in order that we may have further time to reflect upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves the postponement of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. CLAYTON. Of course I do not want to deprive Senators of an opportunity of inspecting this bill. I want to say, though, a few words in answer to what has been said by the Senator from Vermont. He says no person has petitioned here for the passage of this bill. I will say that at the last session of Congress the House of Representatives passed a bill which, among other provisions, provided for the repeal of this section of the Revised Statutes. That bill was sent here and went to the Committee on Public Lands. The Committee on Public Lands reported back a substitute for the bill, and that substitute had in it this very provision for the repeal of this section. While the Senator from Vermont may not have heard of petitions for the repeal of this law, on the other hand no person from the South has petitioned Congress against its repeal. If the repeal of this law will affect the poorer classes injuriously, you would have heard from them, because this is not the first time the thing has been mooted.

His arguments might be very good if these restrictions applied to the fertile portions of the country. If these restrictions applied to Missouri as well as to Arkansas, to Nebraska, to Kansas, to Iowa, and to the States where there are lands really fit for homestead entry, they might perhaps be borne; but it is capable of proof that these lands, which have been subject to selection for over fifty years and which have been offered at the low price of twelve and one-half cents an acre, are not of that character that poor men can occupy them with advantage for farming purposes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask him whether, by the laws as they existed down to 1864, a colored man could enter land and take it up as a homesteader or as a pre-emptor at all?

Mr. CLAYTON. I suppose he could not; but that does not affect this case. If this restriction be repealed, the homestead law will still apply the same as in other States of the Union. This bill does not repeal the homestead law at all. It simply gives to the people of the State of Arkansas an opportunity to engage in lumbering, a legitimate pursuit, not a discreditable one; a pursuit that amounts in some of the States of the Union to a value only second to that of agriculture. Why shut them off from the privilege of buying these timber lands and furnishing their neighbors in Texas, which is a prairie country, with timber?

Mr. SHERMAN. I would like to ask the Senator whether, if this section is repealed, these lands will be open to entry under the graduation law?

Mr. CLAYTON. I can answer that question in a word or two. The graduation law was repealed in 1862, and is not in force at all; but these lands had been subject to the operations of the graduation law. They were in 1860. They found no purchasers then, though they had come down as low as twelve and a half cents an acre.

Mr. SHERMAN. They can only be entered at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. CLAYTON. They could be entered at twelve and a half cents an acre, but now only $1.25. Where were the speculators in 1860, when these lands were being offered for twelve and a half cents an acre? Your speculators examined the lands, and they would not put twelve and a half cents an acre in them. Your policy would be very humane to the colored man if you were offering him something that was worth anything to him; but you offer him poor, barren lands that have pine timber upon them. In the first place, he must go to work and clear off that pine timber and spend his hard earnings for that purpose; and after he has cleared off the pine timber a partridge cannot live upon the land. He is not fool enough to put his hard earnings into any such investment. He has not done it. This law has been in force since 1866, and the facts are that the poor men of the South have not made homesteads to any extent upon these lands simply because they are worthless for that purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator tell us—he has probably looked it up—what the reports of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for these nine years show in respect to the number of homestead entries in those five States or any of them?

Mr. CLAYTON. I will answer. Those reports show comparatively very small entries. I have examined that point. But the entries made are not fair, for the simple reason that persons who desire to obtain possession of these timber lands evade the homestead law in order to get them. It is the only way they can get ownership to these timber lands. Hence they evade and violate the homestead law in order to get these timber lands. How? They go to the land office and make an application; they pay a fee of $5, and that gives them a right to enter on the land and dispose of the timber.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How does an entry give that right?

Mr. CLAYTON. One minute if you please. I say that even the lands that are reported as being entered under the homestead law in nine cases out of ten were entries in evasion of the law. Now I will answer the question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator tell me how it is that these people now get the right of going on and taking off the timber by paying $5 to the register of the land office?

Mr. CLAYTON. They do not get the right, but they do it. If the Senator is familiar with the operation of the homestead law, he knows that if a man makes an application for a homestead tract and pays the fee of $5 he can enter on the lands and occupy them for five years. During the five years he can make a disposition of the timber and then he is not compelled to take the land. When the timber is all off, he can simply give up his homestead right, and the Government has received $5, the timber is gone, and he has evaded and violated the law. We ought to make our laws for the benefit of honest men. Our criminal legislation is for rogues and scoundrels; but this legislation is for the benefit of honest men, to give honest men in Arkansas and these other States the same privileges to acquire the timber lands in those States that men have in Michigan and also in Missouri right alongside of Arkansas.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In Michigan can a citizen obtain a title to the pine lands at $1.25 an acre?

Mr. CLAYTON. If those lands have been offered he can, and a very large portion of them have been offered, nearly all of them, I guess. So that question is answered. Any lands that have heretofore been offered for sale and have not found purchasers can be entered by private entry in all the States of the Union, with the exception of these poor five States who had no representation here when this law was passed.

It is easy for Senators to talk about speculators coming in. I know that is a great bugbear. But let speculators come in if they see proper to do so. As I before stated, when they come in they will pay into the Treasury of the United States the price of the land and subject themselves to high taxation from the State every year, and then, if they hold the lands from market, they will only be doing what the Government of the United States is doing to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. I believe I must ask the Senate to extend the morning hour. Let us proceed with this bill a little further.

Mr. WEST. Subject to a call for the regular order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think when Senators make themselves familiar with its provisions there will be no objection to the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. It would be better, I think, to allow Senators to reflect on what has been said. It will be impossible to get a vote within a reasonable time now.

Mr. CLAYTON. Very well. I will not press it now.

Mr. THURMAN. I do not know what I may ultimately think of this bill. My present impression is not unfavorable to it; but if it is to pass, the amendment which I send up ought to be adopted. I ask leave to offer the amendment which I send to the chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as follows:

Provided, That the repeal of said section shall not have the effect to impair the right, complete or inchoate, of any homestead settler, and no land occupied by such settler at the time this act shall take effect shall be subject to entry, pre-emption, or sale.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think that that will be the effect of the law, but I have no objection to that amendment going on the bill. The homestead settler would not be deprived of his rights under the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. It is only to prevent a man from entering on land on which a homestead settlement has already been made. I think out of abundant caution it ought to be put in.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the continuance of this bill subject to call for the regular order?

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to proceed about half an hour longer with this bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think the pending business before the Senate ought to be pushed aside for any local measure.

Mr. CLAYTON. If Senators desire to become familiar with the provisions of this proposed legislation, and I desire that they should, because I believe that every Senator who makes himself familiar with it will vote for the bill, I shall not object to the bill lying over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is before the Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (H. R. No. 1796) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian bark Arctic; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it is very rare that the extraordinary spectacle is presented to the Senate of a committee which sat for months in its deliberations, and took reams of testimony, and made up what was supposed by the Senate to be a careful and considerate report covering the subject-matter which was committed to it, coming in afterward as a committee or as individuals with ex post facto statements and subsequent light to inform the Senate of matters upon which they did not report but upon which they could have reported. That spectacle, however, was presented to the Senate yesterday. I had seen in the papers of the country, especially the independent press, from time to time, vague statements against the District of Columbia board of public works, implying that there was some great corruption of which those parties had been guilty and which was unearthed by the committee of investigation. I knew that these statements were irresponsible; for when I looked to the report of the committee I found no traces there of any evidence that there was corruption on the part of the board of public works. I found there nothing more than the simple criticism which one lawyer might kindly make of another lawyer's construction of certain statutes, and perhaps a mild deprecation of certain features of a system of operations which had been adopted, but not a line in their report from the beginning to the end implying fraud, corruption, or malfeasance in office of any kind whatever. I had a right to suppose, sir, thus instructed by the committee of the Senate, that in the opinion of this committee Governor Shepherd and his associates on the board of public works had discharged their duty, if with some slight indiscretions, at any rate without any moral obliquity.

Now comes in the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] and says that the committee took evidence for months, and then scarcely broke the shell of the egg; that there was much more testimony that they might have taken. I would like to inquire, in all fairness, if it is the testimony they did not take which convinced their minds that there was corruption, of which he now comes to speak. If it was the testimony which they did take, why then did he not analyze that testimony, either as a minority of the committee, if the majority would not go with him, or from his seat here in the Senate, or by any other means, before we were required to act on the measure which was brought forward by that committee? What influence was there potent enough to tie up the tongues of this committee of investigation? The Senator says they were discharging a high public duty, and were not after individuals. Is it not a high public duty to ascertain whether individuals, who, right under our very face, are intrusted with the discharge of public duties, are guilty of corruption; whether they have filled their pockets with ill-gotten gain; whether they have rewarded favorites at the expense of the Treasury of the United States? Is not that a high public duty? It is the very idea that was suggested in the charges of the memorialists, which were submitted to the committee of investigation, and they shirked their duty if they found really in fact, by the testimony which they took, that there was fraud or corruption, if they did not exhibit that fraud and corruption to the Senate.

But we get the whole key of the matter by an incautious remark made by the Senator in adverting to this point. He says that they could agree that the board of public works ought to be abolished or that the District government ought to be abolished; it was cumbrous, &c.; and that, if they had gone on to consider questions of guilt of individuals, then there would be divisions of opinion among the committee, and consequently they could not agree in such a report. Does not the Senator know that every Senator who heard him believes that, if a majority of the committee had been of his political faith, had believed that there were these acts of public corruption, he, in spite of a difference of opinion on the part of the minority, would have reported that this corruption existed?

Sir, it was because the majority of that committee believed that there was no corruption on the part of these gentlemen, and the minority could not persuade them that that corruption existed, that they made no report in that direction.

Furthermore, I say that, after being somewhat a diligent student of the two or three thousand pages of testimony which were taken by this committee and following out the references which they give in the only part of their report where it is implied that perhaps there was some favoritism used toward certain individuals, I have not been able to find one instance in all that testimony which goes to cast a stigma on any man who was connected with the board of public works, and I say here now boldly, and I challenge any gentleman, on the committee or off it, to put his finger on a circumstance that shows that any one member of the board of public works defiled his hands with a bribe or did any act which was dishonorable to a gentleman. You may talk as you please about the extravagant system of improvements; you may say that these men had a law to construe, and have construed it in a certain way according to their judgment, not according to yours, or that their judgment was erroneous; but this is not a basis to assail the character of men who are now private gentlemen and citizens. Upon no such structure as that can you build either party success or legislative decency. There must be on the part of the individuals themselves whom you attack something in your testimony to warrant your attacks, or else it is unjust, or it is improper; it is un-senatorial.

Now, sir, what did this committee report with reference to this board of public works. I have read the whole report; but they summarize it all in these lines, the conclusion of their report:

Your committee have unanimously arrived at the conclusion that the existing form of government of the District is a failure; that it is too cumbrous and too expensive; that the powers and relations of its several departments are so ill-defined that limitations intended by Congress to apply to the whole government are construed to limit but one of its departments; that it is wanting in sufficient safeguard against maladministration and the creation of indebtedness; that the system of taxation it allows opens a door to great inequality and injustice, and is wholly insufficient to secure the prompt collection of taxes; and that no remedy short of its abolition and the substitution of a simpler, more restricted, and economical government will suffice. Your committee have, therefore, reported a bill for a temporary government, until Congress shall have time to mature and adopt a permanent form.

How much could that have been ornamented; how much at any rate would it have been enforced, provided they could say that the governor of the District has been guilty of taking bribes; that the governor of the District has for a consideration seen that contracts were given to his favorites; that the board of public works has been guilty of false and fraudulent measurements, by which fraudulently and corruptly they had caused amounts to be paid to their favorites which they knew were not due? If those things had been said in the report, we should have been put upon our guard; we certainly should have looked over the testimony, and expected references to it which would have shown that these things were true. I say it was just to this board of public works that, if there were charges of this kind to be made against them, they should be made, and that the committee should report that they were sustained, if they were sustained. You cannot whistle away a man's character behind his back, and by innuendo you cannot put a fair face on it in your report, and then a year or two after rise up and say, We could if we would, if we had had a mind to, say the evil things which were in our minds, and the country would have been startled. I say that this is not a proper course of legislative proceeding. It was due to those individuals who were arraigned by the memorialists that, if these charges were sustained, they should have been set forth in the report. So far from that, this summary which I have presented contains about all there is in the report. There is a criticism or two which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] read, and emphasized the adjectives as if those adjectives contained charges of corruption, when they did nothing of the kind, but simply related to a system. I say there are one or two criticisms on the proceedings of the board of public works, but nothing implying corruption.

Now, just look at this matter of measurements which the Senator from Ohio, by this ex post facto system to which I have referred, lugged in yesterday to the ear of the Senate, as if there had been fraud in these matters. He says a popular error is, that the committee did not know of frauds existing, and did not report upon them; let me quote his own language:

It has been said that there were no charges in our report of corruption on the part of particular individuals. That has been said a great deal, and the absence of such charges has been taken as a vindication of the officials in that government.

Might it not be well so taken? Certainly the composition of the committee, with one or two exceptions, was not favorable to finding innocence if they were guilty. I do not think the composition of the committee with any exception was of that kind in an improper sense; but I mean to say that the majority of the committee, so far as the House of Representatives at any rate was concerned, was made up against the District government, that it was made up, taking a liberal republican into account, a majority against the republican party, and there certainly were very strong men upon it from the democratic party; and, therefore, if there were any charges of corruption to be made or sustained, they would have been very apt to find them. He says:

Such never was the intention of the committee. I must say something on that subject to correct this popular error.

And now he goes on to the specification which he makes to correct this popular error that there was no fraud or corruption.

And I am not disposed to hear that committee criticized unjustly in the light of other people's doings long after that committee has ceased to exist. That committee went on taking testimony. It had to employ an engineer to remeasure the work; and after we had sat until June, and the session of Congress was approaching its termination, we had, so to speak, but barely got into the crust, barely broken the shell of the egg. Some of the most important testimony that we received grew out of the remeasurements made by the engineer the committee employed—a most able and honorable man—and they showed in almost every instance that the District officials had overestimated, had returned false measurements—

Observe, this is a charge of false measurements. Of course this is not a charge directly against the men he was talking about, the board of public works; but their engineer or their subordinates, upon whose faith they must act to a certain extent, and which subordinates, the presumption is, were just as fair as the engineer that was employed by this committee. Why not?—

exaggerated measurements; and not only that, they showed further that more than the contract price had been paid even upon these exaggerated estimates—estimates of work done greatly in exaggeration of the truth, and then payments upon the contracts in excess of these exaggerated estimates.

Observe that this is said in order to sustain the charge that there was corruption; consequently this is the charge of corruption.

We got instance after instance of it. It would have taken perhaps six months of engineering, of remeasuring the work, of ascertaining what was the condition of the streets and alleys and the like at the time that the contracts were let so that an engineer could remeasure the work to ascertain the whole extended enormity of these overmeasurements and of these overpayments.

Now let us see the manner in which they report upon this matter. The Senator knew at that time, and knew better than he does now, for he was fresh from hearing all the testimony, that there were false measurements, that there was corruption in overpayments. Certainly he should have said so. It was due to the Senate that he should have said it; due to these parties if it was proved. Now let us see how the committee talk about it in the report. Let us see how mild they were. Then he and the committee roared "as gently as any sucking-dove."

Your committee employed an engineer to measure portions of the work, and his measurements disclosed many errors and mistakes—

Indeed! Not false, fraudulent, and corrupt measurements, "but many errors and mistakes"— on the streets and av enues, as will appear by examination of his testimony. Most of these were account ed for, however, by the engineers in charge of the work as mistakes—

They were then accounted for, or most of them accounted for. That is the actual declaration of the unanimous committee, that they were accounted for as mistakes—and the engineer in charge expressed the opinion that the work was for the most part properly and accurately measured, and he challenged the most rigid scrutiny of the work of his department.

Now, the Senator from Ohio corrects a popular error, that there was no fraud or corruption in the mind of this committee against the board of public works, by an allegation, and the only allegation he can make, that there were false measurements, when his report, staring him in the face, states that most of these were accounted for as mistakes. Where is the presumption that those were not thus accounted for and were not mistakes? There were engineers employed on both sides. Engineers may differ. Furthermore, these were measurements as the work progressed, partial measurements, not concluding the work, and partial payments, not settling contracts in full.

I again ask what was the motive power that prevented this committee from speaking out if they knew of all this corruption? Certainly it could not be the board of public works, which, by the Senator's own statement, is so potent that its owns Legislatures, that it runs a congressional committee except his own, that it performs wonderful works, transforms a bog of a town into a magnificent city in two or three years, performs almost all the works of omnipotence. It could not be that this board of public works was so potent as to restrain the committee from telling this body things it knew about. That is not to be presumed, perhaps not even suggested. Where then was the potent power that prevented it? I say that it was the duty of the committee so to report, and if they did not so report, they should ever after hold their peace; and certainly it occurs to me that members of the committee do not do well to rise now to asperse the character of men who have passed out of public office and insist that there was fraud and corruption when their report shows that they did not entertain any such belief at the time the report was made.

The Senator from Delaware, emphasizing as I say adjectives, and adjectives not applied to individuals but to a system, commented yesterday—and I am sorry his speech is not published in the RECORD—upon the remarks of the board on pages 8, 9, and 10 of their report.

Mr. BAYARD. It is at the Senator's service. I have it here.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not at my service now, because I cannot stop to read manuscript. I read the RECORD, the place where speeches should be found the morning after they are delivered, certainly in a running debate made to influence the minds of the Senate, and I cannot find the speech there. I know there are in that speech grave charges against individuals. Senators came to me this morning, knowing that I intended to speak, and asked me if I heard so and so, which I did not hear or remember and which they say they did hear, matters which I have a right to inquire about, as, for instance, a charge that the board of commissioners have paid $25,000 for lawyers' fees for the board of public works. I should like to know whether that statement was made in the speech or not. I simply express regret that the speech is not published. If it had been published, I should have gone this morning to the office of the board of commissioners and inquired whether that charge was true or not and asked for the vouchers.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator has made a statement here and it is the proper time for me to correct it now. What I said in regard to the payment of the fees of the private counsel of Mr. Shepherd and his associates is immediately before me in the manuscript of the remarks I made yesterday as reported by the Official Reporter of the Senate unaltered by me, and will now be read. This statement was made in the presence of the Senator, he standing within a few feet of me at the time. He needed no information as to what I said upon that subject; and it is scarcely necessary, because an engagement during the last night prevented me from sending back to the Reporter the speech, which I wished to go over as it contained figures, that it should be stated that I had withheld the speech and kept it from his eye.

Mr. SARGENT. I merely stated the fact that it was not in the RECORD, the place where it ought to be and where I had a right to look for it.

Mr. BAYARD. Here is the report, which I will read now. In speaking of the debt of the District I said:

It is in vain to sing peans to public credit and to national honor, and to do those things which make it impossible to preserve either. I do not know the fact, but I have been informed, and I may say credibly informed, that while the tax-payers of this District were with their private moneys fighting Shepherd and his people before the joint committee and Shepherd was defending himself, as he had a perfect right, by counsel, the private counsel of these discarded officials were paid in the same 3.65 bonds very large fees for defending that which was admitted to be so wrong that it was legislated out of existence. Is that so or is it not so? I am told those counsel have been paid, paid by the people of the United States, paid by the people of this District, for defending a wrong so flagitious that the very capacity to perform it has been swept from the statute-book by an almost unanimous vote of Congress. I am told that they have paid $25,000 in money to one of their party papers for advertising the testimony taken before that committee which exposed the disgrace of those to whom power had been intrusted.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to yield to the Senator to read his own speech; I call him to order.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I then say "Is this so?"

Mr. SARGENT. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator makes a charge that is scarcely creditable to him. If he can afford to stop me when I offer a correction of this kind, I certainly can; but I submit to him that I should be allowed to finish this remark. After stating these facts stated to me, and asking if they were true, I repeat—

Is this so? I do not know that it is so; but I am told that it is so. The gentlemen who have interrupted me—

Referring to the Senator standing where he does now—in this debate perhaps may know. The fact, however, I trust will be easily ascertained; and I say it behooves those who mean to defend the action of the commissioners to answer such a respectful question as that.

This is the report untouched by my hand, unaltered, and there it stands now. It was my misfortune that I could not revise the manuscript last night.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not intend to have the time of the Senate taken up by the rehearsal of that speech over again; I merely wanted to know whether the Senator made a certain charge or not. Now to show the prejudice which speaks through the extract which he has read, the venom which has no cause, allow me to call the attention of that Senator and the Senate to the fact that the board of audit, which I objected to when it was created in the law which passed in 1874, must have been the authority, and the only authority, entirely independent of these commissioners, which could have paid any claim in 3.65 bonds or certificates to be converted into them. It did not come in any sense under the supervision of the commissioners of the District. It was taken out of their supervision by the very law in question. They could not have anything to do with it. And the Senator either recklessly or with prejudice, it seems to me, charges honorable gentlemen with paying illegally $25,000 out of the Treasury, when by the very statute they could have had nothing to do with it; when, on a little examination, he could have seen that they had nothing to do with it. And so he went on with bitter emphasis yesterday for an hour or two laying to the charge of the board of commissioners matters which were entirely within the supervision of the board of audit, which the commissioners had no connection with at all and could not have had any connection with in any way whatever; and therefore I say that I wished to understand—and I was sorry I could not find in the RECORD this morning the report of the Senator's speech, that I might know whether he did, as I now find that he did, charge this upon the board of District commissioners. They are the persons he was assailing. He had nothing to say against the board of audit.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I am authorized by one of the commissioners, now on this floor, to state distinctly and positively that the commissioners as such never passed upon any claim, or consented to any claim, or authorized the payment of any claim for accounts for the defense of Mr. Shepherd or for the defense of that investigation; nor could they. Such a claim could not be passed upon by them under the law. They never considered, never passed upon, never authorized the payment of any money to a newspaper for advertisements or otherwise incurred during the period of the existence of that government. All such claims were by the terms of the law to go not to them if they existed at all, but to the board of audit.

I am authorized further to state by one of the commissioners that it so happened that persons having claims arising under the old government, not knowing exactly what course to take, would sometimes come and present them to the District commissioners. In such cases they, without examination, would simply refer them to the place where they belonged, the board of audit, but never considered them and never passed upon them themselves.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator state as a fact that these fees have not been paid to these counsel, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator was calling upon those who defended the commissioners.

Mr. SARGENT. That was all I addressed myself to. The board of audit was created by this committee, created by Congress, and not even appointed by the President. It was created in spite of my opposition and my protest. I called attention to the fact that these men were overworked in the Treasury Department; that they had no time to attend to these things, that you devolved their duties upon a rag-tag and bob-tail of men to be selected by them to perform their duties. I made the specific point in the debate that it was improper, and asked that it might be stricken out. The Senator from Ohio said that every Senator voted for the bill but one, and emphasized that four or five times over. I was the one who voted against the bill; but he is mistaken in saying there was but one. There were three or four more; the RECORD does not show whether there was one or whether there were fifty, except that the bill passed; but the debate shows that I stood here and objected to the board of audit, and told the Senate this legislation was mischievous; that there ought to be time given, as it was then the 19th and Congress did not adjourn until the 22d, to reform this plan of government. But the bill was rushed through with the whip and spur; and I remember standing here, with all the pressure against me to be silent, to make no amendment, and not to attempt to rush against the mighty bosses of the buckler of this committee. The pressure was so great that I had to say in that debate, "I speak in my right as a Senator of the United States; I assert myself here, although I may seem to be forcing myself upon the attention of the Senate." I told the Senate, "Your board of audit is not right; it is not properly organized; you put no limit upon it; and you plunge this District government into inextricable confusion. The chairman of the committee at that time [Mr. ALLISON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] both seemed to think that no amendment should be made. I said, "If this bill is to be passed by some stolid determination that no amendment shall be made to it at all, no matter what, that nothing shall be considered on its merits, all I can do is to vote against it;" and I did vote against it.

But I was speaking of the remarks of the Senator from Delaware with reference to what he could find in the way of specification or generalities by this committee reflecting in any way on the board of public works or on its system. He found nothing reflecting on the board, simply that they had not been wise, as this wise committee thought, in the discharge of their duties. I must again say it seems to me that the highest vindication for the members of that board is that having been investigated nearly nine months in an existence of less than three years, investigated nearly one-third of the time, first by a committee of the House of Representatives composed of republicans and democrats, and subsequently for four or five months by a joint committee of both Houses, neither committee found they had been guilty of any dishonorable act whatever or anything affecting their integrity as men.

One point which the committee attempted to make at that time was the improper construction of the laws with reference to the amount of expenditures which should be made by the board of public works. It was very important and material that the board of public works should properly construe their authority. Of course if they thought that they had authority to expend $12,000,000 when in fact they had the authority to expend but $8,000,000 the excess would be a charge on the Treasury which the tax-payers of the District and of the United States might be called upon to pay, and therefore it was a very important and a very grave question. Now the question of these laws and of the propriety of their construction of these laws was submitted to eminent counsel as well as to this committee. Caleb Cushing and Jeremiah Black held that taking the legislation of Congress and the legislation of the District together the constructions of the board of public works were correct. I have their opinions in the volume which I hold in my hand. These opinions were all laid before this committee and are to be found in the volumes which they reported to Congress. Among others there was the opinion of Mr. Mattingly, one of the counsel for the board of public works, and in a very condensed form he gives the theory of the board of public works with reference to their powers in this particular; and I want to show what a mild dissent there was from the opinion of these lawyers on the part of this committee. They certainly did not think that anything very flagrant had been done but they could not exactly concur in these views of the law. Now, Mattingly says:

Section 37 of the organic act provides as follows:

"And said board of public works shall have no power to make contracts to bind said District to the payment of any sum of money except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and not until such appropriations shall have been made."

That certainly is very clear. He says:

First. It is claimed that this provision has been violated in this, that the board of public works submitted to the Legislative Assembly a plan of improvement which was made the basis of the appropriation of $4,000,000, and that said plan was not carried out by the board in accordance with its details and specifications; and further, that other contracts of the board beyond the amount contemplated by this act have been made in the absence of any appropriation made by law.

It might be a sufficient answer to this charge to say that if the board has made contracts not in pursuance of appropriations made by law, then the District is not bound for their payment. But we do not place our defense upon any such ground. The four-million act provides in express terms that the money shall be used "as fully as may be practicable and consistent with the public interest, in conformity with the plan of improvement." The proof in the case shows that the board deemed it advisable to narrow the carriage-ways of the streets, and then put down a smooth pavement at about the cost of a much inferior pavement designated in the plan; other improvements that were made were but an extension and enlargement of the plan, and in general conformity with it.

In the prosecution of the improvements it was inevitable that work should be done by the board around Government property; otherwise there would have been breaks in the work on almost every street in the city. The work was therefore done, and the justice and equity of the claim relied on to secure its payment. Reports have from time to time been made to the Legislative Assembly of the District and to the Government of the United States, showing what had been done and what was contemplated to be done by the board.

And that is most true. I invite to it the attention of any Senator who is disposed to cavil at the construction of law determined by the board of public works, or subsequently by their successors, the commissioners. At every step they have fully and carefully laid before Congress their exposition and construction of the laws, the amount of expenditures they have made up to that time, were making, and had contemplated to make, what claims they made against the Government of the United States or against the District. Step by step. Nothing has been done underhanded. It has been open and aboveboard so far as their reports are concerned, and there never has been found in any testimony a fact which goes to invalidate any statement which was made in one of those reports. If so, certainly it has never been called to the attention of Congress.

So universal was the appreciation of the merits and importance—of the work done that both the Legislative Assembly and Congress have from time to time made appropriations for its payment. Take Mr. Shellabarger's own figures—and let us see what is the result. He says the plan prosecuted has already cost $18,872,565.71, (page 18 of his argument.) This amount is derived from pages 464 and 465 of the governor's answer, as follows:

Says the writer—

He was one of the counsel for the memorialists—

Total amount of certificates of settlement issued	$17,546,654 00
Estimate of cost to complete contracts	1,325,911 62
	18,872,565 71
He admits (page 32 of his argument) appropriations by the Legislative Assembly amounting to	$7,620,921 21

We have had it said here over and over again that only $4,000,000 were authorized by the District government. It was not denied by the committee and it is an unquestioned fact that nearly $8,000,000 were appropriated:

Add to this appropriations made by Congress	$3,522,946 18

Of course that would be accepted for improvements or for the object for which the appropriation was made:

Assessments on private property, (429, Record)	$5,217,561 40

Going to swell the fund which was at the disposal of the board of public works for completing these improvements, and which was so dedicated both by the legislation of Congress and by the organic act.

To this should be further added the amount due by the United States, (page 460, governor's answer,) which, at the very lowest estimate, making allowances for every objection made throughout the investigation, would amount to	$3,500,000 00
Total	19,861,428 79

Which fully justifies the statement made by the governor, that, with the assessments and the amount justly payable by the United States, the entire indebtedness of the board could be liquidated.

Now I say that that showing of the appropriations made by the District and by Congress, with the addition of the amount of assessments on private property, shows that the amount of expenditures by them under their construction was a reasonable, a natural, and a necessary construction under those laws. But, says the Senator from Delaware, it was entirely improper (or in effect he says so, because I have not his remarks) for Mr. Shepherd to get lawyers to go in and browbeat the committee and the witnesses for the committee brought there to prove that he was guilty of fraud.

One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.

Occasionally you can find by a mere gesture the flow of a man's thoughts. It was perfectly right for the Government to hire counsel to go in there and browbeat Mr. Shepherd's witnesses or those of the board of public works, to hunt them down, to insinuate fraud, to use all the arts of lawyers, if they did do so. That meets with no condemnation; but when the board of public works were on trial and desired to be heard by counsel, they not being lawyers, it was an unworthy thing for them to employ counsel to meet those brought forward by the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will allow me to ask whether he says that the Government employed counsel?

Mr. SARGENT. I mean to say that the memorialists employed counsel, and there was no criticism against the memorialists' employing counsel. They were hunting somebody down. Give them bloodhounds by all means. Let them hunt them down! But how dense must be that prejudice which can find objection to those who are being hunted down using the ordinary method which the law allows the meanest culprit in the lowest police court, and certainly in the highest tribunals of the land, to defend himself against what he believes or asserts to be unjust aspersions.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator really believe that I objected to the employment of counsel by Mr. Shepherd, or that anything I said yesterday bore such a construction?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Shepherd even employed counsel to go in there and browbeat the witnesses brought forward against him!

Mr. BAYARD. I express my regrets that it was impossible for me to run over my speech last night owing to an engagement over which I had no control. I have handed it to the reporter to-day, and the words will be found in every respect as they were taken down, and so far from my saying that it was wrong to employ counsel, I said he employed counsel, as he had a perfect right to do; but I objected to those counsel being paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I made the inquiry of the Senator and his friends and other friends of Mr. Shepherd whether the fact was so or not, and that has been construed by him into what he terms a reckless statement. I am not now positive of adjectives in my remarks here. They must speak for themselves and the RECORD will speak for me. If it is reckless to ask a question in regard to a fact which I say here was given to me on creditable authority, then I must be convicted of that offense; but surely it is strange that the Senator should so misunderstand me, as he must have done, to suppose that I made the least objection to the employment of counsel freely by these gentlemen. I think Mr. Shepherd and others came before that committee either on the one side or the other precisely on the same footing, and they must bear their own expenses and not ask the people of this country to bear them for them.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not refer to that part of the Senator's speech to which he now alludes, but my recollection seems to me to be distinct. If I am wrong, no one takes more pleasure than I to make amends for any injustice I may have done to the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. That will be due to the Senator himself.

Mr. SARGENT. It is due to myself and my own self-respect to understand it without being reminded of it. But I say that in another portion of the Senator's speech I understood him distinctly to say among the accusations against Mr. Shepherd that he had employed counsel, or that the board of public works had employed counsel, to browbeat witnesses, and the phrase that he employed counsel for such a purpose implied that he had no business to have counsel there or it was a reflection on the character of the counsel employed. That was the remark which he made and which is distinctly lodged in my memory. If I find, however, that I am mistaken on an unchanged record, (and if the Senator says the record is unchanged it must be so,) I will, if he desires it, call the attention of the Senate to it, and to the error I make. I would stoop to no injustice.

I was saying that the committee had before them these arguments of Judge Black and Caleb Cushing, who are certainly not liable to any charge of republican prejudice, and of Mr. Mattingly and the regular counsel employed by the board of public works, advancing these facts and thus reasoning from them; and here is what the committee say in reply to these arguments:

The board have expended and contracted to expend, according to the governor's showing in his answer, (pages 464, 465,) $18,872,565.76, or more than $12,000,000 in excess of the estimated cost of the proposed plan, and largely in excess of the amount of appropriations made by Congress or by the Legislative Assembly, which could be available as a basis upon which to make contracts.

Now, that in itself is a very singular way of stating it. As to the $4,000,000 loan, that may appear an insignificant item. There were $3,000,000 appropriated by Congress to the District at one time, and $500,000 by the District at another time, and an appropriation of between one and two million dollars at another time by Congress, and yet they talk about $4,000,000 being an excess of $12,000,000 over $8,000,000. The excess really was very slight when you take into consideration the appropriation made by the District and by Congress. The excess was the other way when you consider that the amount raised by the certificates was by the law a resource or fund or asset in the hands of the board of public works to go on with their work. The committee go on:

It is claimed by counsel on behalf of the board of public works that the board had lawful authority, derived from appropriations made by Congress and by the Legislative Assembly, to incur these obligations and make the contracts of which they form a basis. The committee cannot give their assent to the claim thus made.

That is all. Is not that very mild? Does that sound in corruption? Is there any charge of fraud here? Here these men have this theory of law, and eminent counsel say they are right from their stand-point, but we cannot agree with them.

The committee do not claim that the board were required to furnish to the Legislative Assembly the plan in detail or the estimated cost of proposed improvements as a precedent condition to the making of appropriations; yet good faith required that so great burdens as have been imposed should in some manner have received in advance legislative sanction.

The very point which this counsel show—that it did receive legislative sanction—that the general plan of improvements was laid down not to cost $4,000,000, but that the plan should not cost more than that $4,000,000, with other appropriations which might be made, and the other resources of the board would allow. Subsequently the Legislature made further appropriation; $500,000, to carry out the plan. The process of expenditure was going on, and the Legislature thus showed its approval. The committe say they do not think it was necessary for the board of public works to submit a detailed plan to the Legislature. And here begin and end their criticisms on this point, the one of the two only which are made in this report of the committee. Certainly there is no charge of fraud in all that. The committee are very mild in their manner. Why was it? If they considered, on such basis, a question of fraud, if they tried out of the testimony to make a showing of fraud, would it not be, as the Senator said, at once the cause for a division of opinion in the committee? In other words, the committee, or even a majority of the committee, did not believe that any frauds were committed, and they had the testimony fresh before them. Of course there might be another reason—I do not know that it ought to be suggested—with reference to honorable Senators, that they desired simply to make party advantage in this matter. Perhaps that could have been so. The attempt evidently is now being made; and that which is right to-day may have been right a year or two ago. It may have been supposed that if they could, by some logic or other, induce the majority of the committee, notwithstanding the failure of the testimony to inculpate those parties, to trample the existing government down on any pretense or plausible points, as, for instance, that these gentlemen erred in the construction of the law, and consequently this system was a little cumbrous and expensive, and we had better stop it, and by such plausible arts induce the friends of these men and those who thought they were honest, and the other members of the committee, to comply, and thereby turn the government out, they knowing the rumors around the country, circulated by a partisan press, that these men were accused of scoundrelism, the very fact of being turned out would be taken as evidence of charges of corruption proved. That very argument has been used in the country since that time. When you talk of this to men now and show them that the old authorities of the city incurred a debt of $5,000,000 and left the city a quagmire, and then these men went on and expended thrice that amount of money, and made it a beautiful and healthy city, and that the committee sat for months and did not find that they ever put a dollar of money into their own pockets, or rewarded any parties through favoritism, or did any dishonorable act, the reply is apt and ready: "We cannot believe that. For what reason did they turn these men out?" That fact supplies the place of all showing of fraud, and does its office. It stands as a fact in proof of all the mean insinuations which could be made against these men by a partisan press, or on the floor of the Senate, or anywhere else. But the showing of the committee is that it was simply a question of construction of laws, of error of judgment, and not of fraud.

The other point which they make is worthy of some elaboration, because it was commented on here yesterday, and that is the policy which the board adopted in the letting of contracts, causing, it was charged, a higher price to be paid than should have been. I have looked through the records of the testimony cited in this report this morning, commencing at page 1013 and ending at page 2356, to verify the following statement made in the report:

> This system—
> Of letting bids—
> made easy another reprehensible feature of this business, namely, the awarding of contracts to persons who were not expected to perform them, but who were thereby enabled to sell them for a consideration to others to execute.

I say the testimony shows nothing of the kind. It does show that certain men claimed that they had influence in getting contracts, and in every case where it was traced up it was not shown that any member of the board of public works knew of any such pretension on their part or that they had any reason for saying it. Now, this system of letting these contracts was simple, and it is worthy the attention of the Senate. Before any contract could be let at all the board of public works made a very thorough advertising of all the different kinds of pavement which they were likely to put down and invited bids. The competition was very strong and they received a very large number of bids. Of course they could have gone on and let out the contract to the lowest bidder under those bids to have done the work and then repeated the operation when further work was to be done—a somewhat expensive system and, as has been shown by the experience of the Government and private enterprise, a most dangerous one, leading certainly to favoritism, leading to straw bids and to imperfect work. Instead of adopting that system, which might have been done, the board of public works received this large number of bids. For instance, on the MacAdam pavement they received seventy-five bids, the average of which was $1.78 per square yard. They would not pay that price. They offered to men who would give good security, to any man who would give good security, that he should have the contract for $1.50; that is to say, less than the average of the bids. And so they did with all other kinds of work, with concrete pavement per square yard, for the average of the bids was $3.15 and it was let for $3. I find here on page 1808 of the testimony a showing of the cost of doing such work in different cities of the United States—New York, and Brooklyn, and Baltimore, and Boston, and all the large Atlantic and western cities—and I say, and any Senator can verify the truth of what I say, that under this system adopted by the board of public works the average cost of performing the work in the District of Columbia was 20 per cent., and from that to 25—over 20 per cent.—less than the average of the work done in the cities which I have named. It may be accounted for by some other considerations; for instance, there was considerable work to be done here and men might take contracts for large amounts of work at less than they would take casual small contracts; but, however it may be, giving that its full influence, nevertheless the cost of doing the work here was from 20 to 25 per cent. less than the average cost of such work in other cities of the United States.

This of itself, which cannot be controverted, is testimony in favor of the economical manner in which the work was done; and you fall back, after all, upon the criticism that they did too much. Yet they did no more than they supposed they might do, as the phrase used by Congress and the Legislature was that it might be a comprehensive system of public improvements.

In view of these facts—and if I have overlooked any of the charges in the report I want my attention called to it—in view of these facts and of this treatment of the matter, I want to know what guarantee there is for these general charges of corruption? What excuse for this extreme vituperation? What excuse for impaling men here before the highest tribunal of the country, delighting in their torment, using studied epithets, and exhausting the dictionary for words that will express contempt and contumely of men against whom the committee report nothing dishonorable, and in all their three thousand pages nothing is to be found to show that they acted dishonorably?

Again I express my regret that I have not the speech of the Senator from Delaware. He spoke of a tremendous crime. Perhaps I do not use an adjective as strong as he, but it was a crime at any rate against Columbus Alexander in believing or making the charge that he paltered with men to steal the private books of another. This was one of the outrageous and nefarious crimes against somebody—I believe the Senator did not say who. I wonder if it was against Alexander R. Shepherd, or which other member of the board of public works, or perhaps the District commissioners. Why, sir, there are several things to say about that. Declamation does not necessarily convince. Branding an accusation as an infamous crime does not make it such; and it may be that in the calm and sober judgment of some other people there was some foundation for that accusation; and if there was, there may have been some foundation for it in the minds of those men who brought the charge. I take Alexander's statement only for it, and I will show that he offered to pay express charges on stolen books. A man comes to him who he knows is not the custodian of those books, has no right to them, and comes by them by an improper, illicit proceeding. Whether a burglar or not I do not know, and I do not know whether it was explained, but he does not seem to have inquired, and he makes a bargain which he subsequently agrees to keep, that if this man would give those books to him, he would pay the express charges on them. Does any one deny that that is a fair statement of what he said? If so, I have his testimony right here, and it will give me great pleasure to read it at length if any one desires me to do so. If gentlemen do not desire it read, I say that is a fair statement of his testimony, and I am prepared to show it. A man comes to him and is introduced to him as having possession of the books of another who obviously had no right to them, and a bargain is made that he will pay him express charges to bring them from another city where they are concealed; and they say that when these parties subsequently went on and endeavored to steal the books and carry out their side of the contract it was infamous to suspect Columbus Alexander of having anything to do with it or knowing that they intended to so act. Their theory, on the other hand, is that all this machinery, this sending men to Columbus Alexander, this getting the innocent man to act the thief, was all set in motion in order to make it appear that Columbus Alexander was such a man that he would countenance the stealing of books. Is there anything more of their theory? Suppose Harrington, as they would allege, set up all this plot, what was the object of it? To disgrace Columbus Alexander by showing that he would be privy to or counsel a burglary by which books should be stolen. There is the infamous crime committed in saying that that was probable under the circumstances. Columbus Alexander shows that he himself treated with a man who could not have got possession of the books except by stealing them, and I suppose one crime of stealing is as bad as another. Larceny is as bad as burglary. He was willing to pay the express charges on them by his own statement. It is a terrible crime for the board of public works because somebody suspected him, and it is not known who, with being susceptible to such influences. I do not know this man and have not the slightest disposition to do him injustice and would not have thought of mentioning his name in connection with this debate. He has nothing to do with this bill, which is simply an attempt on the part of the Government of the United States to observe its pledge and see that the interest of these bonds is paid. But when he is lugged in here by the Senator from Delaware and exhibited like the Savior of the world crucified between thieves, I think it is worth while to find out which is the thief and which is the Savior.

Now, as near as I can remember the extremely long speech of the Senator from Delaware, he spoke of extraordinary burdens which were laid upon the people of this District. I know the debt of this District is considerable. I regret that it is so much, but I hazard the assertion that there is not an intelligent unprejudiced resident of this District who would be willing that this District should be plunged back into the misery, the filth, the sickness, the squalor of ten years ago, to be relieved from every dollar of the debt. I say that a great public benefit has been done here. It may have cost money; and I say to you republicans that the republican party, if it had a sense of its own rights, of its own dignity, would glory for this great work that has been done here for the capital of the nation next in order to that great work which it did when it saved this capital from falling into the hands of the rebels. It preserved this capital of the nation. It cost some money to do it. Does anybody regret the cost of that? It has taken this capital, which was a mere swamp, where on a rainy day, crossing any of your crowded thoroughfares, the street-sweeper, the little ragged boy or girl, would stand with his or her broom and make a lane through the walls of mud which were running in from the sides, as the finger of God made a lane for Moses through the Red Sea, the mud piled up on each side, that you and your wife might go through with your garments undefiled. That was the condition of things. You could not drive a carriage over three of the streets of this city. None of them was paved, or with scarcely an exception. Some red Seneca stone or stone of that kind was laid in one or two of the streets and there were cobble-stones on Pennsylvania avenue until they were replaced with a wooden pavement, as implied by the Senator from Delaware, by the board of public works, but not by the board of public works but anterior to them. That charge cannot be laid to them. It cost something to do this, as it cost something to save the city from the clutches of the rebels; and who regrets the cost unless the money was stolen? Then it might be regretted; but, if the money was expended so that it went 20 to 25 per cent. further toward valuable and useful improvements than the same expenditure in other cities, who shall regret it? The junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] seemed to imply that the old filthy hovels, the old filthy streets, and pestilence-breeding swamps unredeemed by sewers were good enough for shop-keepers and the men who lived in the huts along the obscure highways of the city as they then were. Those might be good enough for them; and if they were not let them go out West and live. But I say they were not good enough for the capital of the nation. Under the influence of these wholesome improvements which have been made, the taxable property of this District during the past year has increased $3,500,000. Instead of having these old shanties, which he said would be appropriate in the wilds of Arkansas, they are being pulled down and comfortable homes are being erected; the city is being beautified on every hand; the citizens are emulating the government in the work of improvement which is being made.

I remember the time during my service in Congress when an epidemic of small-pox in this city, fed from the contagion in the air, was something terrible; but a year or two ago when a pestilence of the same kind was threatened it was immediately arrested; and why? Because we had healthy air to breathe and wholesome water to drink; because the filth was carried far away from our dwellings by a complete system of sewers. It cost money, of course, and why should it not cost money?

But the debt of the District is not so extraordinary as it is stated to be, and there is no necessity, in the language of the Senator from Illinois, for Almighty God in His wrath to put His foot upon anybody on account of the debt. If so, I am afraid that New York city would go deeper, and the city of Boston; and I could suggest to him Buffalo and several others. I should like to call attention to the debt of these cities, and see whether the debt of this District of Columbia is so extraordinary. In New York the debt is $136,000,000, which is $144.34 per head of the population. The debt of this District at the time of the report I hold in my hand, which was after the board of public works had once been investigated and during the last investigation, was only $75.18 per head.

Mr. MERRIMON. That was the ascertained debt, I suppose.

Mr. SARGENT. Ascertained debt. Since that time, of course, there has been the addition of the claims allowed by the board of audit and the bonds issued upon them, which would modify this statement perhaps 10 or 15 per cent. Of course the statement is subject to correction for anything which has happened since the time the report was made. By the table, which will be found on page 1944—I call attention to the fact—it will be seen that New York, Brooklyn, Jersey City, Elizabeth, Boston, Portland, and several other cities enumerated here have a greater debt per head than Washington. Take the city of Buffalo, which has 118,000 population and an annual municipal expense of $1,335,000, while the District of Columbia has 131,700 people, and its annual expense, aside from these extraordinary improvements and extraordinary expenses which were contemplated by the legislation of 1874 and enjoined upon the board of commissioners, is less than two millions, or in less ratio. New York expends even at the present time over thirty dollars per head of its population, and Washington does not expend half of that.

Now I should like to ask, in connection with all these facts, why it is that this committee were so very reticent? Why did they not make some showing against the board? I should like to appeal to the chairman of the committee whether he believed himself that there was this corruption on the part of the board of public works, if any member of it stained his hands with illicit gain? and I should like an answer. When it is gravely alleged by a colleague of the Senator on the committee that these things are so, I have a right to appeal to the chairman of the committee to know whether the committee so thought or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I will endeavor to answer the Senator's question after he has concluded his remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish the Senator to answer me now merely to that point.

Mr. ALLISON. I prefer to wait.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator does not wish to do it. Then I hope he will answer me whether this is authentic or not:

> Shortly after the adjournment of Congress last year Mr. ALLISON addressed the following crisp and ringing words to a friend: "I am sorry that Shepherd was temporarily sacrificed, as he has done so much for the city. He can afford to wait, however, as no stain is cast upon his honor or integrity by the investigation or report."

I should like to have the Senator tell me whether he wrote that document or not.

Mr. ALLISON. I trust the Senator will give me an opportunity to answer after he finishes his remarks.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well; in the Senator's own time.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not propose to be catechised in that manner by the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. No, I am very far from any disposition to catechise; and I believe it is not catechising when a Senator respectfully asks another a question. If it is, I apologize and withdraw it. I only hope the Senator will not forget to inform the Senate before he gets through whether this was written by him; and, if so, whether there was any foundation for the statement of his colleague on the committee that the committee knew that these men were guilty of frauds and wrongs on the Government of the United States. This is no thing to play "hide and seek" about. The committee had a public duty to discharge. Were these men guilty or innocent? I do not care whether the Senator answers or not; but I say, if he does not answer, the judgment of the public will be formed upon the written report; and my opinion is that it will be formed upon that in any event. It certainly would be if the public could get it.

I understand—or I thought at the time I understood, as I read day after day the testimony which was taken down verbatim and published in the daily press in this city, the proceedings of this committee—the political exigencies that required that prosecution. It was not difficult to understand. Men's minds were then recently dwelling upon the affairs which had happened in New York City, and it was necessary that the democratic party should find somebody upon whom they could fasten, justly or unjustly, some infamy, in order to offset the horrible crimes committed by the agents of the democratic party in New York City, by Tweed and Hall and company. There was the necessity. Some bright and shining example of corruption must be had, and consequently men were at once assigned their parts: this one to prosecute, that one to gather testimony, this one to scribble, and that one to declaim. They attempted to wake up a revival against the republican party over this matter in the Moody and Sankey fashion, where a great deal should be done by claqueurs and a good deal by shouting, and nothing very definite be said and nothing very definite be understood by the public. It was necessary to cover up the infamy of Tweed.

I have been a reader of the speeches of my friend from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] and I know he is a strong partisan, as he has a right to be. I honor him for following his convictions; and I believe that he desires to give advice where it will be for the benefit of the Republic, and I have been puzzled to know why it is, when he and other Senators, after such a report and with such testimony, have been able to stand up here and charge corruption in the expenditure of public money in this District, they have never said one word of rebuke in their own party, where their counsels would be so potent, against those men who were bankrupting the reputation as well as ruining the finances of a great city. Why, sir, the crimes and infamies of the democratic administration in New York stand conspicuous, a landmark that no one can miss, like Mont Blanc among the Alps, like Andersonville among the horrors of dungeons and torture, pre-eminent and startling. Have we forgotten what this pure democratic administration did, in New York? There were no republicans there to interfere with their operations, nobody even to call them to order. They ran everything, assessed the taxes, made the laws under which taxes were assessed; collected them, spent them, put them in their own pockets. During two and a half years of Tweed's democratic rule in New York, Hall, Tweed, and Company expended $147,713,870—$59,000,000 and over a year, and over 5½ per cent. of the valuation of all the taxable property in the county. They increased the debt over $83,000,000 and spent besides over $63,000,000 cash. In other words, in two and a half years they squandered 14 per cent. of all the taxable property of the people of that county.

We heard something about a printing bill, of $25,000 I think the amount was, that this board of audit paid or at least gave certificates for. What a horrible crime! What business had they to pay $25,000 for printing? This democratic administration in New York, so near to the Senator from Delaware that as he went to bed at night if he had his windows open he could smell their stench, spent over $7,000,000 for printing besides $3,000,000 of claims for the same which were unsettled when the developments were made.

The New York Transcript, having a circulation of five hundred, was made the official journal, and had all the advertisements, and it was owned by the officials who were prohibited by law from having contracts. How fortunate it would have been for the Senator from Delaware if he could have coupled a condition—a circumstance—with his statement and said that Shepherd was interested in the paper that got the $25,000. The New York Leader was also a corporation paper, and Mayor Hall was said to have been a large owner in that journal; whether truly or not, I know not.

This District committee find that there was some construction of law different from what they would have construed it, by which more money was spent than they think they would have spent if they had had the expending of it. This Tweed government in New York, this pure democracy, had an appropriation for repairs of $70,000 for 1868 and 1869; and, contrary to law, they spent on such repairs $4,016,111.91. What an excellent thing it is to belong to a party that is so pure and so good that you can pay all your attention to your adversaries, point out their evils, and have no fault to find at home!

Mr. SAULSBURY. Will the Senator allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SARGENT. With pleasure.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not, as the Senator from California is, a friend of the board of public works here, but I desire to ask him this question: Does he not know that it was the present governor of the State of New York who interfered to overthrow the corruptions in that city practiced by Tweed and who prosecuted him to judgment and conviction?

Mr. SARGENT. So far as the present democratic governor of New York is entitled to credit in that matter, I cheerfully accord it. I do not know how much he had to do with it. I understand he did have something to do with it. I have no doubt that other patriotic democrats worked to the same end, overwhelmed and shamed by the corruptions of their party. But my impression is that a republican newspaper in New York, a large, leading paper was the one that first called attention to these enormities and forced them upon the attention of democrats.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator, but I desire to ask him one further question. Does he not know that the ring, as it was called in New York, was composed of men who claimed affiliation both with the republican and with the democratic party? I wish to ask him this further question, whether he ever knew of any prominent democrat in the State of New York in the legislative halls rising up to defend their action?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know about that, because I have not been a reader of the debates in New York; but that there are dishonest republicans in New York I have no doubt. The example set before them by the democrats was so contagious and so bad that I am afraid some of them may have been contaminated. But I call the Senator's attention to one thing, and I should like to have him state the inference from it if he can, and that is that after all these frauds I speak about, blackening and staining this man Tweed until the devil himself would be ashamed of the comparison, he was elected by a democratic constituency to the senate of New York. Whether he there raised his voice in defense of these frauds I do not know.

Mr. KERNAN. I would ask the Senator from California what was done with Tweed and those other robbers? Were they continued in place? Were they continued even in the city? Or have they been either sent to prison or compelled to fly to foreign countries, forfeiting their bail? Did they stay there, recognized as men who were to be sustained and defended?

Mr. SARGENT. My last reading of the matter—the Senator may be fresher than I am—is that democratic officials allowed Tweed to go in broad daylight.

Mr. KERNAN. Will my friend give me the slightest pretense of authority for that? I will ask him another question. Is it not true that during the last fall a democratic attorney-general and governor received into the treasury from one of these men, collected by suit, $600,000; and suits are now pending against the others?

One other question. As the Senator arraigns New York, will he tell me who were in power in the Legislature when the extraordinary charter was passed which gave those men the powers by which, under the pretense of governing, they robbed the people of New York. Samuel J. Tilden went up, and republicans with him, and remonstrated with the committee against that charter, but a republican Legislature passed it, and a republican senator afterward was arraigned and tried for being bribed in reference to those measures, and resigned to escape what was worse.

Mr. SARGENT. I dare say he was guilty. If you hold the republican Legislature as responsible for extravagance or illegal expenditures under the legislation that you refer to, then I would like to ask whether you do not arraign this committee worse than I have done in proposing and securing the passage of a law the effect of which is to produce the additional expenditure of five and a half million in this District? But I am not sufficiently familiar——

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator permit me to answer? I have arraigned nobody. I simply, when apparently to justify the action here what was done in New York is lugged in, ask gentlemen to follow out the precedent, if the action here corresponds with New York, and punish the men and recover back the money.

Mr. SARGENT. All right.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not say it is so, for I do not know. I have arraigned nobody.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not know whether the Senator arraigns anybody or not; he says "recover back the money." Recover back what money! Who stole money here?

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator was citing from New York apparently to justify something here. I do not say it does; but I say then he should follow out the precedent. I have arraigned nobody; I am not familiar with these details; but when you bring up that matter here, if it has any bearing, I ask you to follow the example to the end and send the men who deserve it to prison if there be such, and recover back the money for the people if it has been wrongfully taken; I do not know that it has. But why is the corruption of New York paraded here? That corruption I do not defend and never defended, and the party I acted with turned the representatives of these men, regular though they were, out of our convention in 1871 because they were guilty of these things.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, who defends corruption here, and who dares charge it? That is the question. Who dares charge it? The Senator says he does not charge it. Who does charge it? I have looked through the report of this committee, and I do not find any charge of corruption.

Mr. KERNAN. My question is——

Mr. SARGENT. I do not yield.

Mr. KERNAN. Ah!

Mr. SARGENT. I do not yield for a speech. I have listened to the Senator, and now intend to reply, and intend also to proceed with my remarks. I say the charge is not found by this committee; it cannot be made, that any money ever was surreptitiously taken out of the Treasury of the Government or the treasury of this District. I did not bring in the frauds in New York as an excuse for these; but when democrats get up and are so eloquent over these matters occurring in this District, and make loose allegations of fraud, I call their attention to facts that are startling in their party. That is the object of bringing it here. I say that they themselves must either repudiate those things or blush with shame.

Who ordered the investigation into the management of affairs in this District? Was it not a republican Congress? Who tolerated the investigation and ordered it and carried it on? It was a republican Congress, although those who composed the committee were largely democrats. What has been done in New York toward this point? There were certain judges, not necessarily democrats, who held that Tweed was amenable to law, and democratic officials allowed him to escape. The Senator says that there were some few hundred thousand dollars recovered by judgment, and perhaps paid into the State treasury. What is that? A mere drop in the bucket. Those men stole more, and the Senator knows it, than the whole debt of this District. If they had done something toward the improvement of the city, if they had——

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman says I know it. Will he yield?

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly, if I misrepresent the Senator.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that we did discover in New York that there was plundering, and so soon as we could we commenced prosecuting the guilty parties criminally, and recovering the money civilly. We overthrew the men from political power, and have sought and to this day are seeking to punish them criminally and to recover back the money civilly. That has been and is being done. I am not here now to talk party; but every good man in the party in power there has aided, in conventions, in courts, and in the administration, to bring these men to justice and recover back from them and put in the treasury that which was plundered from the people by them when they were in power. Although they were democrats they got no mercy at the hands of those who were intrusted with the government under that party from the time we overthrew them.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend from California yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. I want to say in regard to this New York fraud, though it has no connection with this subject except as a reply to the attempt that has been made here, obviously to make political capital, that it was believed by this country for years before it was finally developed that enormous frauds existed in the city of New York. There was a corrupt judiciary, the most corrupt this country has ever known. But after the Tweed fraud had been developed by a republican newspaper and evidences brought forward that could not be met at all, then prominent democrats jumped in with a view of investigating the fraud and relieving the party from the odium and taking to themselves the credit. It is to be said, I think, as a matter of fact, that that was not done until the evidence had first been laid before the nation of a character that could not be answered.

Mr. KERNAN. Permit me to say in reply to that——

Mr. SARGENT. I would prefer that the Senator should wait.

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly, I have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator will have ample opportunity to talk. This matter is very interesting, and I am perfectly willing to hear any explanation which can be made by the democratic party for their silence heretofore in condemning these things. I do not know but that some of the democrats of New York may have endeavored to trace up these things. My recollection is that Charles O'Conor did so; and, although he was in opposition to his party on national matters at the last presidential election, still I presume he would be considered a good democrat, and I give the democratic party credit for any exertion that Mr. O'Conor made in that direction. They say that Governor Tilden did something in the same direction. All right; I am glad to hear it; and I hope they will be able to show a roll of one hundred democrats who did the same thing, and of leading and influential ones; but I say the fact still remains to which I called attention, that after all these disgraceful iniquities, which I have not half stated yet, Tweed was taken up by a democratic constituency and put into the Senate of that State. They did these things boldly and shamefully. They did them through all the machinery of the party and all the machinery of the city. They did them by subsidizing the newspapers in which they owned an interest. The scandals existed for months, and then a republican paper, as the Senator from Indiana says, called attention to them, and nailed public attention down to them, until finally it was impossible to avoid hearing; and then it was that democrats as well as republicans began to stir. I am glad they did even at that late time. I give them full credit for it. But as against the paltry few hundred thousand dollars which it is said has been recovered or judgments obtained for, I do not know which, let us see what they did.

The furnishing of the court-house there alone cost $7,000,000. Think of it! The furnishing of one insignificant building, while the building itself cost double what the magnificent post-office built by the United States close by it cost including all its furnishing. It was a grand nest-egg for the democratic retainers of that city. The carpets, the estimated value of which was $1,200, cost $350,000. I think it is about time that some democrat should object to the scandals which were raised by transactions like that. The repairs of the armories, of which I think there were twenty, cost $2,700,000, and the plastering $2,800,000. Why think of it! It would almost plaster a roof over Manhattan Island. There was paid to Keyser for plumbing $1,221,000. The window-shades of that sublime building cost $23,573. Ingersoll's bills for furniture were over $5,000,000.

I do not wonder that democrats writhe under a statement like that. I do not wonder that the frauds in their party are distasteful to them. They certainly would be distasteful to me if they were in my party. I could not say a word in defense of them.

I said that there was a necessity for a republican Tweed. That was why I was looking into these things. These things were a stench in the nostrils of the people of the nation, and the crowning act was when a democratic constituency rewarded Tweed by sending him to the State senate, and then it was necessary to find somebody, and they went to the city where most work was being done, and they organized investigations which lasted for nearly nine months, first by one House of Congress, and then both Houses, and what was the result? The first committee reported an entire approbation of the proceedings of the board of public works—and this report was signed by democrats—of their construction of the law as well as of their expenditures, and specifically acquitted them of any charge of fraud, said there was no such showing of any kind whatever; and yet there was a most envenomed prosecution before them, and all the power of the Government was used to compel the attendance of witnesses. Baffled in this mere party attempt, they then started in for another investigation, and then they got a committee of both Houses, and they took over two thousand pages of testimony. The mountain again labored, and brought forth that ridiculous mouse. [Holding up the report.] No charges of corruption are sustained at all, and there is no assertion on the part of the committee that there was any corruption.

Now what ought the Government to do with reference to this District? Ought it to tie up its purse-strings and do nothing? I have seen the fire department of this city playing its streams and wearing out its hose in saving public property at night, and at a time when we were not paying a dollar for the fire department, and we have only done it within a year or two. Take the Seaton House down on Louisiana avenue, where there are vouchers and evidences of indebtedness paid by the Government to the extent probably of $150,000,000, at the mercy of the devouring element. Upon whom do you rely to keep that building from being entirely consumed; and so of all your public buildings? The fire department of the District of Columbia. It is only quite recently that you have paid anything toward the Metropolitan police. Here for years and years, for generations, the people of this District paid for guarding the streets and alleys, and made our lives safe as we went to and fro. So I might go through the whole list. The amount of property the Government owns in this District is equal to, or a little exceeding, by the report of the assessors, not counting personal property in the public buildings, that owned by the citizens of the District—about $96,000,000 in each case.

What is the duty of the Government in such a state of things? It is not the case of an isolated post-office or custom-house elsewhere, however magnificent, or the ownership of a wharf, which is no local inconvenience or burden to the people, and where the Government simply pays for its share of streets around it; but here is a city made up of Government property almost, where it has the fee simple of the very streets, and can close any street or avenue by legislation to-morrow and would be upheld by the courts in so doing, as it has been heretofore. The Government owns this magnificent building and other buildings costing over $30,000,000, and to replace which now would cost $50,000,000. I ask what the Government, being this great property-owner here, ought to do for the people of this District? Ought we to say to these men, "Wallow about in your filth; be decimated by the death rate; keep your old huts along dingy highways, because in Arkansas or in the back parts of Illinois they have such." Is that fair or liberal? Is that the spirit which we ought to entertain? I come from a distant State, and have no more interest and I might say less than almost any other Senator on the floor; but I recognize this as the capital of the Republic, as associated with all its glories, as deserving to be well and decently treated by the Government. Ought it not to have at least one-half of its annual expenditures paid out of the Treasury of the United States in consideration of the United States having one-half of the property here? We are told that we are talking grandiloquently about the capital, and some Senators turn deaf ears thereto. This is not justice to this District; and I claim that we ought to be liberal, or at any rate ought to be fair, toward the people of the District and enable them to bear their burdens. It has been said over and over again, but I repeat it, that the magnitude of these streets and these avenues is an additional reason. Do people anywhere in the world aside from a national capital—and I know of none on a scale so magnificent—ever for themselves lay down such a plan for a city? How shall the people here keep these avenues in repair, these mere shop-keepers, as they are sneeringly called? The Government does more to wear out these streets than the citizens do. Hauling the great granite blocks to the Treasury ruined Pennsylvania avenue when it was paved with cobble-stones. The Government dragged those blocks along in their carts day by day, causing great holes down in the Avenue until it was impossible to pass along it. Yet the Government did not repair it. If anybody said anything about it, it was answered, "We have corduroy roads in Illinois; let the people go to Illinois, go West." It is these works of the Government which have destroyed the streets after the citizens have put them in partial order. The ordinary use would not so wear them out. So the columns of this Capitol, great, heavy burdens, the artillery which was concentrated here and thundered through the streets during the rebellion, all contributed to destroy the streets. The Government in this way made extraordinary wear and laid on the people extraordinary work. As the Government owns half the property, real and personal, in the District, ought it not to tax itself if it will not allow the city to tax it?

There seem to have been two branches to this discussion, one entirely unnecessary to it which I would not have adverted to had it not been forced upon us—a discussion of the character of the board of public works, assailing them as corrupt men, as unfaithful officers, of being guilty of some mysterious thing which the committee of investigation could not report to us because it could not make up its mind whether it existed. That is part of the debate on a bill simply to redeem the credit of the Government. The other part is that the board of commissioners who succeeded them also have been guilty of illegal transactions, and, by a certain implication, perhaps of corruption. The responsibility of these commissioners is limited to the construction of the act of June 20, 1874, and the application of the law as construed to the work they ordered. They have had nothing to do with the auditing or payment of claims of any amount existing prior to June 20, 1874, all such having been passed upon by the board of audit exclusively, without any communication or consultation with the commissioners, and so of all claims arising out of contracts of the board of public works executed by the commissioners. All these passed to the board of audit for their examination and audit. The commissioners have nothing to do with the settlement of those claims. All they do is to order the work to be done under the direction of the engineer, who is appointed by the President under the act of June 20, 1874, even the engineer being supplied to them.

Now, it is said that these commissioners did not know their duty; could not construe that statute, or knowing their duty construed it wrongly. I do not know whether they knew how to construe it or not. I defy any man to construe that statute with certainty. In parts it is not even grammatical. If the object which is avowed to have been in view was the real object, there never was a statute so ill calculated to carry out its purpose. We are told now that one object of the statute was to terminate at once and forever the board of public works and its transactions; that the system was obnoxious and must be done away with; and yet the committee in effect and Congress did nothing more to change the system and make all things new except to change a board of public works of five into a board of commissioners of three. There was not a power belonging to the old board that they did not confer on the new. In general terms, it was simply a continuance of the old scheme of government with all its powers and duties, except that they took away from the board of commissioners, I have no doubt to the full satisfaction of that board, the auditing of old claims or auditing of anything in reference to improvements. If there is any other distinction, I should like to have it pointed out. Now let us see what this statute says:

That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, is hereby authorized to appoint a commission, consisting of three persons, who shall, until otherwise provided by law, exercise all the power and authority now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, except as hereinafter limited; and shall be subject to all the restrictions and limitations now imposed by law on said governor or board—

Shall "exercise all the power and authority now lawfully vested in the governor or board of public works of said District, except as hereinafter limited." Those so-called limitations do not limit these words at all; if anything, they explain and enlarge the authority, whatever their intention may have been—and shall have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of said District to the payment of the current expenses thereof, to the support of the public schools, the fire department, and the police, and to the payment of the debts of said District secured by a pledge of the securities of said District or board of public works as collateral, and also to the payment of debts due to laborers and employés of the District and board of public works; and for that purpose shall take possession and supervision of all the offices, books, papers, records, moneys, credits, securities, assets, and accounts belonging or appertaining to the business or interests of the government of the District of Columbia and the board of public works, and exercise the power and authority aforesaid—

If there ever was an ampler grant of power than that I do not know how it was or could be framed. It was as broad as the subject and language could not make it more comprehensive. And now let us look at the "limitations"—

but said commission, in the exercise of such power or authority, shall make no contract, nor incur any obligation, other than such contracts and obligations as may be necessary to the faithful administration of the valid laws enacted for the government of said District—

Does anybody pretend to say that the board of public works had power to make contracts to carry out invalid laws? If not, that limitation amounts to nothing. The power of each was co-extensive—to the execution of existing legal obligations and contracts—

These are the only ones that any board has the power to execute, and consequently these are not words of limitation—and to the protection or preservation of improvements existing, or commenced and not completed, at the time of the passage of this act.

That is to say, they were to perform all existing contracts, where they were legal and valid, made by the board of public works. They were to step right into their shoes. The Senator from Ohio said that after their report of December, 1874, when they found that Congress did not act and treat this as a temporary government, and appoint their successors in a more permanent form, they got new life and branched out and assumed new powers. I say, sir, that the Senator is utterly mistaken in that, and I call his attention to the document which was read by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] written in August, 1874, and called out by this circumstance. The memorialists, or some of them, or persons representing them, called upon the board of commissioners and requested them not to carry out the contracts of the board of public works; the commissioners heard them carefully, took the advice of their counsel, and then wrote a document, a portion of which—and I am sorry I have not the whole of it—was read by the Senator from Massachusetts, bearing date in August, 1874, one month after they went into office, and in that document they themselves review their relations to the District, and speak of the powers which are conferred on them by the statute, and directly say that they are entitled to do these very things, and in fact enjoined by law to do them. On the 13th of August, 1874, they say:

First. We hold that by the act of June 20, 1874, Congress has recognized the validity of the contracts of the board of public works, whatever their defects in their origin or the manner of their execution, subject to the exception common to all codes of law, namely, that contracts fraudulently made are void, and that all contractors who shall elect to accept the provisions of the law as to the mode of payment prescribed therein secure to themselves all benefit.

There is no uncertain voice about that; nothing is done in a corner. They stated exactly as they would state to-day and as has been contended for them in this debate, at the very outset of their duties as also at the first session of Congress, exactly how they construed the law.

Secondly. That the defects, if they existed, of excessive price, want of antecedent appropriation, or those involving the making of the debt of the District to exceed $10,000,000, were all known to the investigating committee and to Congress, and were covered by the act of June 20, 1874, under which the commission was organized.

Thirdly. The commissioners, therefore, hold that the prosecution of any or all the contracts of the board of public works to completion is for them alone to decide. * * * You will remember that in rendering their decision the commissioners adverted to the fact that unless the act of Congress had provided for the payment for all future work under existing contracts in what are known as 3.65 bonds, it would have been impossible to have completed the sewer system or any considerable portion of the contracts for other improvements, as the making of new contracts would have compelled the paying of money, &c.

If that had been said, not at the time, but a year and a half thereafter, there would have been some color for the Senator's statement. I fear he has not read this and did not know of it. I understood him to say that he had not read the report of the commissioners for 1874 or for 1875. If he did not say so, some Senator who was arguing on his side of the subject said so. I should like to know what justice there is to the commissioners in talking about their construction of the law, their exceeding their powers, &c., without even reading their report and knowing the grounds on which they placed their construction. It seems to me that is injustice in itself which ought not to be done. Then they did not get any new light.

But I was saying that the powers of this board were made very extensive. Let us look further:

All taxes heretofore lawfully assessed and due or to become due shall be collected pursuant to law, except as herein otherwise provided; but said commissioners shall have no power to anticipate taxes by a sale or hypothecation of any such taxes, or evidence thereof.

Construe that with the ample jurisdiction of the board of audit over all claims on contracts, written or oral, and on all claims for damages and there was a grant of power amply sufficiet to carry on all proceedings of the board of public works. Here was this committee professing at the time to be thrillingly impressed with the idea that a board recognized by Congress might misconstrue the law, might become extravagant, might enlarge its own powers, and this committee, with this monition so fresh in their minds, write here with their pen a law throwing every imaginable power into the hands of these parties, and by their qualifications even enlarging the scope of the duties of these men, and then come in and complain, "We did not understand that these men would construe it this way, we did not suppose that these operations would go on."

Mr. MORTON. I will ask the Senator if, in their report to Congress, they did not state the construction that had been given to this law?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir, they did in that very first report; and they gave a list of ninety-nine contracts as those they had approved, part of which they had already executed at a cost of five hundred and odd thousand dollars, and they estimated that to complete the rest would cost somewhere about $1,700,000. Here was the direct monition to Congress of their construction of the law, of the contracts which they had sanctioned, and the other proceedings thereunder, and the partial expenditure. When did they enlarge their jurisdiction? When did they get new light? Perhaps they got new lights in reference to oral contracts which the Senator from Ohio talked about and which he refined down by saying that referred to the wages of laborers employed by the board of public works. He has refined it down and said that meant only laborers, the men who swept out the offices, with whom of course there was no written contract, and we in all magnanimity would not overlook them, and therefore put in the words "oral contracts!" O, the infirmity of senatorial memory! In that very legislation there was a provision of $75,000 to pay those very employés, covering that very subject. The committee meant obviously, as now the Senator himself must admit in view of all the facts, that the word "oral" there meant those contracts which were extensions orally by the board of public works, as for instance when a man had a contract to pave certain streets he had a promise that if he did that faithfully and thoroughly he should have the extension of it to still another street. Those were oral contracts, (there were contracts of that nature,) and men went on and had partly executed these oral contracts, and the question was whether they should be left out simply because the contract was not in writing. I think it was a proper proceeding on the part of the committee to do that. I commend that. The law is defective enough certainly in other respects to entitle it to that charity on my part. But that is what they meant by the word "oral." It is ex post facto wisdom which would apply it to laborers who were provided for expressly by another provision of the bill.

The Senator from Ohio complains in the specifications he makes against the board of commissioners of the cost of the board of audit, as if they created the board of audit or could limit its expenses. Among other criticisms which I made against this legislation at the time it was adopted——

Mr. THURMAN. I made no complaint at all against their allowing the expenses of the board of audit—not one word.

Mr. SARGENT. Did you not make complaint of that item of expenditure?

Mr. THURMAN. I was speaking about the expenses of the District. The Senator interrupted me, and I said he was mistaken in supposing that I was making complaints. I spoke of the expensive system which was carried on. I was making no charges against anybody.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, the Senator's complaint, or his criticism, was of a system by which a board of audit became so expensive and was so expensive. Why, sir, I thought of that when the bill of 1874 was under consideration, and in my remarks I said that you were going to give an irresponsible authority to pick Tom, Dick, and Harry up out of the streets, their services to be paid for at any price the board of audit might see fit, without any control; and I proposed that, instead of that, the supervision should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury, and that he should have the power to limit the number of assistants and prescribe their compensation. That was refused, and the Senator from Ohio himself argued against the proposition which I made and said that I misunderstood the bill entirely. I said furthermore that assistants were authorized to go on and discharge all the duties of the First and Second Comptrollers; in other words, the board of audit under the act. I said, "Some unknown persons may be appointed to discharge these duties."

The Senator might find that there was wisdom in that remark of mine, and that there is reason to believe that the First and Second Comptrollers have not been the only parties that have passed on claims. I said that it was an improper board; that it ought not to be constituted, but that, if it was, the power to select subordinates should be given to the Secretary of the Treasury, who himself should be held responsible for the action of his subordinates, that we had just confirmed him unanimously, and I had no doubt Senators on both sides of the Chamber would say that they had confidence in him, and I asked that he be given the supervision of these expenditures. Now the Senator comes in and complains of a system reported in his own bill, of a system defended against argument on the floor of the Senate, of a system which he insisted was so perfect that there should not be any amendment to the bill whatever, even to correct this feature of it. It is well that senatorial memory should be good. If the Senator wants the debate, I will give him the pages. Let him look at the RECORD of the Forty-third Congress, first session, pages 5154, 5155, and 5156, containing the debate of June 18, 1874.

The Senator emphasizes that only one Senator voted against the bill,

I voted against the bill and was the Senator alluded to; and I gave such reasons as I could at the time, although the pressure here upon us for a vote was so strong that, as is shown in the debate, at one moment I had to say "I stand here in my right as a Senator of the United States to state my objections to this bill." The pressure was to get me off the floor. He says it was open to debate, and the Senator from Indiana could have come in and debated it and made motions, &c. I received, I will not say discourtesy, for I received none at all and do not complain of what occurred, but if the Senator from Indiana had been here and felt the pressure of the opinion which had been worked up by the newspapers, by the memorialists, by the committee, by the mysterious something they would not report about, which was pressed upon us, and the assertion that there was no time to elaborate or perfect anything, he would not have made any remarks at all perhaps, unless he had been, as I was, determined to assert his right to be heard where he thought a thing was wrong.

I say then, sir, that this law from beginning to end was so loosely drawn that a cart and horse might be driven through it. In that very debate the chairman of the committee got up and said in reply to a question of mine, "We do not intend to limit the amount of this debt; we do not limit the amount of the debt." Well, then, if you did not limit the amount of the debt, if you did not put that important limitation on it, who shall you blame for making a debt different from the limit you had in your minds and did not express either in your report or in your statute? Let me read what he said:

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say one word in reply to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California. The committee carefully considered the very question which he raises with reference to this board of audit. The First and Second Comptrollers of the Treasury are the proper officers of the United States to supervise all the accounts of the United States. Now the Government proposes in a measure to take charge of this debt of the District of Columbia. We pledge the faith of the United States to the payment of the interest of this debt and to the payment of the principal at maturity.

Again, we place no limitation upon the amount of this debt. We do not say that it shall be five million or six million or three million dollars; but we say that, whatever it is, when these two accounting officers of the Government, who have shown by their acts hitherto that they are faithful accounting officers, put their signatures to these accounts, these accounts shall go to the sinking-fund commissioners, and there and then be converted into a bond of the District, the faith of the United States being pledged for the principal and interest.—Congressional Record, Forty-third Congress, first session, page 5156.

I did not believe in the logic at the time. I thought that there ought to be a limit to the debt. I thought we ought to understand just where we were driving to. But finally it passed under this pledge: "These men we make our referees; they shall ascertain the amount of the debt; they shall issue certificates, which shall be converted by the sinking-fund commissioners into 3.65 bonds; and Congress will stand by them, and we pledge the faith of the Government to pay the interest." On the 1st day of February prominent Senators on this floor, who might be supposed to have some responsibility in reference to the finances of the Government, received telegrams from New York from the men who had acted on that pledge and invested in 3.65 bonds, asking why the faith of the Government had gone to protest, why their coupons were not paid.

> Thou canst not say I did it: never shake
> Thy gory locks at me.

I tried to remedy these things and prevent the very difficulty into which you are now plunged. This board were required to go on and complete all the legal contracts, written or oral, of the board of public works. They were required to preserve all the improvements. The board of audit was required to take into account all damages of every sort whatever. Now you come in and complain that you find a large debt, when you yourselves said when the bill was passed in the Senate that you did not propose to limit the debt in any way! It is unkind to thus carp and criticize eminent gentlemen who heretofore have had high service in the Republic, who are respected at home, and respected here, and respected throughout the country, because they have carried out your intention and you find that the result is that there is more of debt than you expected. At any rate, they did not do it without making it known to Congress, as I have said, step by step. In 1874 they reported to Congress; in 1875 they reported to Congress. Senators think this of no account, no matter, and therefore do not read the reports.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; I will yield for a question.

Mr. HAMILTON. In addition to the limitation spoken of by the Senator from Massachusetts the other day, and by other Senators, on the power of the board of public works to contract debts, not only against the Government of the United States but against the District of Columbia, I beg to call the Senator's attention to sections 124 and 125 of the Revised Statutes and to ask whether they have been repealed. I cannot find a repeal. Section 124 reads thus:

The District government shall have no power to borrow money or issue stock or bonds for any object whatever, unless specially authorized by an act of the Legislative Assembly, passed by a vote of two-thirds of the entire number of the members of each branch thereof.

That does not amount to much; but the next section, 125, is this:

The debt of the District, including the debts of the late corporations, shall at no time exceed the sum of $10,000,000, unless an increase over the said amount shall have been previously authorized by act of Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. The law now operative was passed subsequently.

Mr. HAMILTON. Did it repeal that?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir, because inconsistent with it.

Mr. HAMILTON. I understand not.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, I think it did. It placed the power in the hands of these commissioners without limit.

Mr. HAMILTON. Seeing that at the time the District government was put in commission the debt had almost reached $20,000,000, I would like the Senator to read the repeal of this section.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not say it is repealed in express terms. I merely meant to say that the District government was abolished and that a board of audit was appointed with power to go on and examine certain classes of indebtedness, and that when they found that indebtedness good they were to issue certificates of indebtedness which were to be converted into bonds, and that the faith of the Government is pledged to the payment of those bonds; you may call these District bonds or United States bonds, as you choose; but this legislation was subsequent to that statute and would take its place if inconsistent with it.

Mr. HAMILTON. Let me state the point I wish to make. The board of public works had exceeded its authority by $8,000,000 at least, if not more, at the time the board was abolished or when the Congress of the United States thought it was abolished, for I doubt whether it is abolished yet, and I do not think it is, but at any rate there was an attempt to abolish it. The point I make is that all contracts in excess of the $10,000,000 at that time were void. Nevertheless the Government authorized this board of audit to go on and audit all the vouchers that had been given out by the board of public works, thereby implying that the Government would shoulder that debt. I so understand it. But in all conscience will the Senator or anybody undertake to say that ninety-nine or one hundred unexecuted contracts at that time amounting to millions of dollars were subsisting valid contracts? I do not understand it that way, and the very language of the law shows that Congress did not consider them valid contracts. They spoke of legal obligations of the Government, valid contracts——

Mr. SARGENT. I cannot yield for a speech. I am willing that the Senator should be heard, but I am somewhat weary and want to conclude. I shall do it in a few moments, and give way to the Senator.

Mr. HAMILTON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I thought he was speaking against time. If he will pardon me one other observation I have this remark to make: I that thought he might withdraw his amendment now, for I have no doubt the bonds have exceeded $15,000,000 before this time. That is my impression. I thought the Senator was arguing against time with that object.

Mr. SARGENT. After having courteously yielded the floor to the Senator to ask me a question, and then to make a speech thereupon, I did not suppose that I was to expect an ungenerous remark. I shall not reply in the same spirit, and I therefore proceed with my remarks.

I believe that so far as I have addressed the Senate it has been in strict reply to the remarks on the other side of this question. I think it is about time that one side of this case should be presented when we have these mysterious winks and nods from members of defunct committees of what they could do if an opportunity had only been given to them. As we gave them that opportunity we had a right to expect them to speak or else forever after hold their peace; and therefore I have felt that it was my duty, by examining the testimony which they submitted at that time and the report which they made, to show that these thoughts of theirs are long subsequent to the time when they made the report, or else they were restrained by some mysterious influence which was not reported to the Senate.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] made one point in his speech, amid much that would require no particular reference, which seemed to imply that the board of commissioners had largely and extravagantly exceeded their powers. I do not know what means the Senator took to inform himself with reference to that matter, and perhaps the simple reading of the document on its face was all that he was required to attend to; but I believe that he himself would do ample justice and make ample reparation provided he were shown by the original documents themselves that contract No. 916, to which he alluded as being for some seven or eight thousand dollars and afterward extended to some $202,000, was not merely for the original contract, confined to a limited space in a single street, but involved under exactly the same conditions contracts 36, 41, 246, 921, 709, and 989, contracts which themselves, together with 916, made the exact area which is covered by the contract to which he refers as 916. These contracts were each of them legal, valid, binding contracts, coming down from the board of public works and under this legislation necessary to be carried out by the board of commissioners. If that is so, the inference which the Senator draws that seven or eight thousand dollars was expanded to $202,000 falls entirely to the ground, and this I have no doubt he will admit on this statement of the facts. I have the document here.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire of the Senator what is the name of the contractor?

Mr. SARGENT. The original contractor was John O. Evans, the one referred to by the Senator, who assigned his contract to Murdock, who goes on under this extension of the contract, or under this consolidation of contract, to do the work on streets which were provided in the original contract.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator alludes to the man who assigned his contract in one and executed it in the other capacity.

Mr. SARGENT. I allude to contract No. 916.

Mr. DAWES. Not having the book before me——

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose the Senator has his remarks; if he has not, I will send them to him. I am replying to his criticism upon No. 916. I have the book here and he is entirely welcome to it. I say with reference to that contract, as I understood him, he said it was a contract of seven or eight thousand dollars and had expanded to $202,000, I think—at any rate to over $200,000; and it was simply for the work done on a single street, a limited portion; whereas I call his attention to the fact that, so far as the board of commissioners is concerned, the contract he refers to relates to seven contracts, and the aggregate of those contracts covers what his ground embraced in this extension of 916.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator has my speech before him I would like to understand his point more fully. I have not got it and my memory is very poor. But it seems to me that the total of the John O. Evans contract was $101,000. If the Senator finds that I stated it differently from the way in which it was reported in the book, then I stand corrected and agree to the correction very cheerfully. If I did not read it accurately from the book, it is a mistake that I am willing to correct. If I did read it accurately from the book (and I had the book here) and the Senator has some information which I was not furnished with, I would be glad to have him state it.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator could have had the same information that I have furnished him by asking for it. I did not make the charge; I am simply replying to it. If the Senator will examine the remarks I make, which he will find in the RECORD to-morrow morning, if I do him any injustice I know my friend well enough to know that he is sharp enough to set himself right.

Mr. DAWES. I inquire of the Senator if he finds, on comparing what I did read here with the report from which I read, that there was any inaccuracy in my statement?

Mr. SARGENT. I do not say the Senator misquoted any figure, but I merely say that he overlooked the fact that No. 916 was a consolidation of several other contracts, and that so explained the increase in amount cannot be thought improper.

Mr. DAWES. If my friend will allow me, I will put in an interrogatory which his last remark suggests. If No. 916 grew out of a consolidation of several contracts, did it not make a new contract?

Mr. SARGENT. That is another subject and foreign to my purpose; but I think not. Certainly not involving a new subject-matter or new parties.

Mr. DAWES. I do not know enough about the way in which the business was done here, but it seems to me like this: If you take half a dozen contracts and consolidate them into one and make them all up into one contract, applying to that one contract the several subjects-matter which No. 916 in the beginning applied to, it seems to me as if it was a new contract; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. SARGENT. O, yes; I understand the humility of the Senator and I appreciate it. I simply remarked that there was no subject-matter changed and no change of parties except that which was worked by an assignment; but whether it was a new or an old contract was not pertinent to my remarks at all. I am not discussing that proposition. I simply called the Senator's attention to what I supposed to be an error in his arithmetic.

Now this committee, or the members of it, now that it is scattered, place some stress upon the fact, that the board of commissioners exceeded the estimates of the committee. I want to call attention just for a moment to the estimates which they made under several heads, in order to show how very far the committee were mistaken. They estimated the amount due or to become due on incomplete contracts at $1,325,000. The amount on these uncompleted contracts become due was $1,717,268, and that became due by the necessary operations of the contracts, and without the extension of them or additional expenditures at all. The claims for damages on account of change of grade and for property taken from streets was estimated by this committee, after months of laborious examination, at $550,000, whereas the amount allowed by this board of audit, created in the manner in which I have described, was $1,035,428.39. Who is to blame for that or who is deceived? If Congress placed any reliance upon these estimates of the committee, and thought this amount would be half a million instead of over a million, it was deceived. The committee was deceived probably in making that report; but are the board of commissioners responsible for that? The board of audit finds on this single item alone over half a million of money in excess, and the debt runs up, and consequently the board of commissioners must be railed at. They had nothing to do with auditing them or parading them; it is taken by the policy of this statute entirely out of their hands.

Mr. THURMAN. What was that item of $550,000 for?

Mr. SARGENT. "Claims for damages on account of change of grade and for property taken from streets." Now I think it might be worth while to call attention to the fact that since this board of commissioners have been in power they have paid off and reduced the debts of this District since July 1, 1874, by $1,564,843 56. Of this amount $455,627 has been reduced during the past year. That does not look like much extravagance. If the board of audit on one side is increasing this debt, the commissioners on the other side are doing their best to decrease it. And of all this amount over a million was out of accruing revenues of the District coming from taxes and other District income, and not from an appropriation.

The proposition before the Senate is simply to carry out the pledge which was made in the law, an ill-advised law I think, and reiterated by the chairman of the committee, that the Government would pay this interest or see that it was paid: that it pledged its faith to that effect. That is the simple question before the Senate. Senators have seen fit in the discussion of that question to wander over the board of public works and matter antecedent to the creation of the board of audit by which this debt has been ascertained and I have considered it my duty to follow them in that devious path. I have spoken as I considered it my right to do in defense of men who, so far as our records show, after full and fair examination, are spotless of iniquity. If in the testimony which was not given before the committee, to which the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] alluded, and consequently which he did not hear, there was something which would have inculpated these men, I simply say that is dehors the record. I speak of the record as it is. If I spoke outside of it I would declare my belief in their integrity and admiration of their energy and public spirit.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, it seems to me that this debate has taken a very wide range and that it has run into somewhat irrelevant matter. I may, however, be mistaken. When the learned Knickerbocker sat down to write the history of New York he spent a large portion of the first volume on the various cosmogonies and theories of the creation of the world, for which he gave the very satisfactory reason that if the world had never been created there would have been no such place as New York. Upon that principle I can explain the irrelevancy of much of the discussion that has taken place upon the measure now before the Senate, but upon no other.

In connection with these bonds, or the legislation with regard to them, some facts are very clear and appear to be admitted on all hands, and, as it seems to me, some very plain principles result from those facts.

First, the act of Congress did authorize the issue of valid bonds. That is not disputed.

Second, it is admitted that part of the bonds which have been issued were duly and legally issued and for valid claims. That is not disputed.

Third, all are made negotiable and all refer to the same statute for authority for their issue.

It is claimed that part of the bonds were illegally issued; but in what is it claimed that this illegality or irregularity consisted? Not in the law; not in anything that appears upon the bond; but because the state of facts which would bring the case within the statute had not taken place. That is the ground and the only ground upon which the validity of these bonds so far as the Government is concerned, is resisted. These bonds have mainly, I suppose, been negotiated to and are in the hands of men who have advanced money upon them. They were all negotiable, and all in the same form. Of what were the holders of these bonds bound to take notice when they received them? They were bound to take notice only of what appeared upon the face of the statute and the face of the bond. They could not be required to take notice of the state of facts which alone would bring the case within or without the provisions of the statute. Seeing the names of the proper public officers attached to the bonds, they had the right to presume that those officers had ascertained the existence of the necessary state of facts to authorize them to issue the bonds. If any other view were taken, it will be readily seen that the negotiation of public bonds could never be accomplished.

I therefore think that as a matter of equity, of justice, and of law, between the holders of these bonds and the Government of the United States, the Government is bound to make good its guarantee. This would be the rule of law if the case were capable of assuming the shape of a suit at law. At least such is my view of the law as well as of the justice and equity of the case. But to prevent any further abuse of power under this statute, if such abuses have taken place, I would stop the issue of all further bonds until a proper investigation has been made in regard to the certificates said to be still outstanding. I shall therefore vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.]

This, Mr. President, is all I have to say in regard to this joint resolution, and it seems to me I have covered all that is really involved in the merits of the case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I would like to ask the Senator from New York to give me his attention in respect to his amendment. What does he propose to do with that class of persons, if there be any such, to whom certificates have already been issued but who have not received their bonds for them, assuming that that class of persons held legitimate certificates; taking that for granted?

Mr. KERNAN. I will state to the Senator that I supposed in view of this discussion that this body would appoint some committee to examine and find the true state of things; and if there be any certificates, to examine and see if they were for just debts, and then we could provide for their payment. My only object, the Senator will permit me to say, was—and from what I heard I thought it wise in reference to our constituency and the people of the District—that we should not permit negotiable bonds to be issued for which when they passed into the hands of bona fide holders the issuer and indorser would be liable whether their issue was just or not. By my amendment we would prevent that, and yet we would deal justly with everybody who had or had not certificates, and a committee could look into them and see whether they were right or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not at all sure that that is not perhaps the best way (although naturally I should have supposed that the limitation ought to be upon any further issue of bonds except such as might be necessary to complete the proper certificates already issued) that we should stop there; but if we are to have an inquiry, that is probably of no special moment.

I merely wish to add that, having paid some attention to this debate and to the law, I am not by any means persuaded that these commissioners have exceeded their powers. That we have ourselves been greatly disappointed as to the amount which they have found it necessary to expend to put things into proper order here, under the law and in the execution of their powers, I am quite ready to agree, because I thought in the time of it that it would not amount to half as much. I did think it would amount to a great deal more than the estimates then made, as is the case with everything. Every one of us who builds a private house knows that, in spite of everything we can do, the end exceeds the estimate. I did not suppose it would exceed it by so great a sum as it appears to have done. I do not know precisely myself what the explanation is, but, so far as I can see, I am not by any means satisfied that these gentlemen have exceeded the authority that the law has reposed in them. Whether they have exercised that authority in good faith or not is of course an entirely different question. From what I know of them myself (and before this time all of them were men known to the public) it would take certainly great evidence to lead me to believe that they had acted otherwise than with the utmost purity. That they may have made mistakes, and gone further than on reflection they would be now satisfied they ought to have gone, is very possible. I do not know that, inasmuch as I have had no conversation with any of them upon the subject; but, on the construction of the law as it reads, I think they might fairly have been advised by eminent counsel (as I have heard, not from them, that they were) that this line of policy which they have pursued was clearly within the duty which Congress had marked out for them; but, as has been stated so well by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] the only thing we have to do now, as we are not on an investigation, is to provide the means of paying this interest.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I am afraid the Senate at the end of a wearisome debate is apt and is likely to do what I regard to be a violation of the public faith which we pledged to the holders of these certificates. The amount, I am told by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, is $900,000, a very large sum, reaching from the beginning of the action of the board of audit until this time. By the terms of the certificates, printed on the face of them, a copy of which I produced the other day in connection with my argument, they are plainly convertible into a 3.65 bond, and the only reason why the board of audit did not issue the bond in the first instance instead of the certificate was that that duty was imposed upon the sinking-fund commissioners. It was a mere clerical duty. The sinking-fund commissioners, having to provide the sinking fund, also were required to issue the 3.65 bonds. The holders of these certificates stand exactly in the same light as if they were the holders of 3.65 bonds, because they have the right under the law to convert them into 3.65 bonds.

The Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] raises the question as to whether these certificates are negotiable. I do not know whether they are technically negotiable or not. They are issued convertible into negotiable bonds or into bonds negotiable by delivery, and they are in a sense quasi negotiable, and I am not sure but that under the terms of the law they are strictly negotiable. An ordinary certificate of indebtedness, not in the form of a promissory note, is not negotiable in a legal sense. We all know that; but these are certificates issued convertible at the will of the holder into bonds deliverable and transferable by delivery. It seems to me they are therefore in the nature of negotiable paper, and I assure the Senator from New York that the effect of his amendment would only be to raise a doubt of the willingness of Congress to stand squarely and fairly by the public faith pledged in the act of 1874, and it would tend also to lower the mercantile value of the securities in the market, and they will unquestionably have to be paid eventually either in money or in 3.65 bonds.

Suppose the United States now refuse to pay these certificates in 3.65 bonds as we have agreed to do, are we not bound to pay them in money? Suppose hereafter a committee should inquire and find that these certificates were issued for value received, for work done in the execution of valid contracts, and we had refused and denied and withheld our performance of the mode of paying the certificates, could not the holders of the certificates come in here and demand of us instead of 3.65 bonds $900,000 in money? It seems to me it would place us in a very embarrassing position.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Why not sue us for the money in the Court of Claims?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator says they might sue before the Court of Claims. If we now refused to pay them that which we agreed to pay them when we issued the certificates, we would be bound to pay them in money. Now it does seem to me it is better for us to allow these certificates to be converted into 3.65 bonds. The board of audit seems to be the only authority that could have issued the certificates or that could affect this matter at all, because the commissioners had nothing to do with the issue of certificates or of bonds. If there has been any fault, it has been the fault of the judicial officers selected by us by law to issue these certificates. It seems to me it would be a fruitless thing to adopt the amendment except to delay and procrastinate the payment of these certificates, which must be paid in the end, either in money or in 3.65 bonds, and it struck me as wise at once to settle these liabilities, limit them, and repeal the board of audit.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I did not expect to again participate in this debate, and would not have done so, nor taken up the time of the Senate, but for the fact that latterly the committee who originally framed the act of the 20th of June, 1874, seems to be on trial, rather than an effort being made to pass a bill authorizing the payment of interest on bonds which we have guaranteed by our law. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] says if he had been present when this bill was under consideration he would have voted against it. The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] takes pains to tell us that he did vote against it; and I do not know but that if this debate should continue for a week longer it would be difficult to find Senators here who voted for the law, so great has the effort been to arraign the gentlemen of the joint committee who presented the bill to the Senate, and upon whose recommendation it finally passed both Houses of Congress.

I am not to be drawn into any charge against the old board of public works, nor am I to be drawn into a defense of that board. The Senator from California has taken pains to rake up the dry bones of this dead government, manifestly for the purpose of putting somebody in the Senate, either on the republican side or on the democratic side, upon the defensive. I shall not undertake to make remark upon the courtesy of debate which should make such an attempt. I have only to say in reply to that Senator, and to all Senators, on this subject, that I stand upon the report made by the joint committee which investigated the affairs of this District. I stand upon the report made there, and upon the testimony there made, and I have nothing to take from it, nor to add to it. It may be that I have written letters, extracts from which were pubished in some newspapers and read by the Senator here to-day, in mitigation of some things which occurred with reference to that report and to that investigation. I do not deny that I have written letters upon this subject, but I only wish to say that I stand upon what was said in the report and unanimously agreed to by the joint committee. Is there not enough in the testimony and in the report made by this committee to justify the committee in recommending to Congress the abolition of the government existing in the District of Columbia on the 20th of June, 1874?

The Senator from Indiana tells us that if he had been here he would have voted against the bill. The Senator from California tells us that he did vote against it. Therefore I am to assume, I suppose, that if these two Senators had been in their places they would have voted to retain the existing condition of things, as that was the only alternative presented to the Senate in the last days of the session.

Mr. MORTON. I will say to my friend from Iowa that I did not mean to say that I would have voted to retain the old government as it stood, because there was a part of that government of which I never approved. I mean to say to my friend that I would have voted against any bill which proposed to abolish entirely popular government in this District.

Mr. ALLISON. I speak now only with reference to the Senator from California. That was the opinion of the Senator from California.

Mr. MORTON. I did not at that time refer to changes in this bill at all, but I had a fundamental objection to it, that it created an absolute government over the people of this District and deprived them of all representation and all power in the management of their domestic affairs. That was the fault I found with the bill at that time.

Mr. ALLISON. I perhaps did the Senator from Indiana an injustice, and if so, I did not mean to do it of course. Every gentleman on the committee, so far as I know, quite agreed with the Senator from Indiana; but we had not time during the closing hours of the session to prepare a system of government in which the people of this District could take part. Therefore we proposed only a temporary government, and did provide by law for a joint committee of the two Houses, whose duty it should be to prepare a system of government for this District republican in form—and I believe that language was used in the section of the statute to which I refer—a bill in which it was supposed the people of this District would participate at least in a degree.

I want to call attention for a moment to another subject, and I do this only in justification of my own action. I did not anticipate or expect to precipitate a debate here, lasting for days on this question when I offered the amendment which I offered on the first day the bill was considered; nor did I make a single charge against the integrity or purity of the gentlemen composing this board of commissioners. I said then as I say now, and repeat here that I have as much confidence in their integrity, in their ability, in their purity as any gentleman on this floor. I only said that I believed they had exceeded their authority and misconstrued the act under which they were created. I had a right as a Senator on this floor to say that. Notwithstanding their high character, they are public servants; they are the creatures of our laws; and as such we have in a temperate way certainly the right to criticize their conduct and their actions. It was only in that spirit and in that sense that I alluded to these gentlemen at all in debate on the first day that this joint resolution was under consideration in the Senate. But inasmuch as I made these allusions and inasmuch as other collateral questions have been raised here in this debate, I want to call the attention of the Senate briefly to the questions involved in the original act as reported by the joint committee.

Gentlemen say the commissioners had a right and it was their duty to recognize as binding all the contracts made by the board of public works. Now let us see whether that was their duty. The board of public works was created by the act of 1871. The District government was created by the same act. Congress imposed upon this board an inhibition with reference to creating a debt in this District. They said they could create no debt nor incur any obligation except in pursuance of appropriations made by law, and previously made. That is in the organic act. The board of public works in the beginning so construed that law and called upon the District Legislature to make appropriations of money. They presented to the District Legislature what they called a comprehensive plan of public improvements in this District. And, in passing, let me say that they adopted a species of division with reference to these improvements that made it necessary that a comprehensive plan should be agreed upon. What was that? That the people of the District should pay two-thirds of the cost of these improvements and the adjacent property-holders should pay only one-third. Therefore it would be manifestly unjust to make a distribution of these improvements in one part of the city to the exclusion of another part of the city. One of the great difficulties the investigating committee had in its examination was the complaint that a certain so-called combination of real-estate operators in this city had purchased up the northwestern portion of the city and all the improvements were being made in that part of the city to the exclusion of Capitol Hill and other portions of the District.

Therefore this comprehensive plan was submitted to the Legislature. It was agreed to by the Legislature. It was to cost $6,000,000 in round numbers; there were some odd thousands. That comprehensive plan, which involved various streets in the District, was agreed to by the Legislature. One-third of the sum was to be paid by the adjacent property-holders, namely, $2,000,000, and $4,000,000 was to be paid by the District, and bonds were issued to pay the $4,000,000, and a debt was created for that purpose.

That was the origin of this great system of public improvements, so called, and it continued until a portion of the people of this District became dissatisfied, and they appealed to the House of Representatives in 1872 to investigate the conduct of this board of public works. A committee did investigate their conduct, took the testimony of witnesses, made extensive examinations, and I believe finally reported that they were not derelict in any respect. But mark what followed that report. It was followed by the statute so pertinently alluded to by the Senator from Texas, namely, that the total debt of this District should never exceed $10,000,000. Notwithstanding they relieved this board of public works from any dishonesty or extravagance in that report, Congress upon the heels of it limited the debt of this District to $10,000,000. The object of the statute was to restrain this board of public works from continuing these improvements upon the grand scale which they had adopted. Now this old system went on, the board of public works paying no attention whatever to this limitation of the act of May 8, 1872, incurring obligations, creating debts without any reference either to the question of appropriations as provided by the organic act or without any reference to the limitations of this act of May 8, 1872, and the joint committee found in its report that they had exceeded this limit by some $8,000,000. If Senators will take the pains to read this report they will see that the committee was unanimously of the opinion that they had exceeded their authority; that these contracts, except in pursuance of appropriations made by the District government, in excess of the limitation of $10,000,000 were void contracts. That was the construction put upon these laws by your committee. It is true that this board of public works had as an indorsement of their action the advice of eminent counsel, such as Mr. Black and Mr. Cushing, as has been stated by Senators in argument; but it seemed perfectly plain to your committee that here was an intention on the part of Congress, first, that this board of public works should not go beyond the appropriations; and, secondly, that there should be no power in this District that could create an obligation to be paid for by the property of the District exceeding $10,000,000.

Therefore your committee decided that these contracts were without authority of law; that they were not legal and valid contracts. The Senator from Indiana took exceeding great care in every word he uttered in this debate to say that these must be valid contracts. As a matter of course, valid contracts of the District of Columbia would be binding upon these new commissioners whether they assented to them or not. A valid contract against the corporation could be enforced in the courts. But the very question was whether these contracts were valid or invalid, and upon the invalidity of those contracts, and upon the fact that this board of public works exceeded their authority, your committee recommended that this board of public works be abolished. What for? For the purpose of establishing here, in lieu of that board, a power which would not exceed its authority. That was the design of it. This board of public works had expended $18,000,000 in the improvement of the streets, and alleys, and sewerage of this District. They had incurred a debt which, when it was summed up by the committee, amounted to $11,000,000. And right here let me say to the Senator from Indiana, who objects to this original act because it provided for 3.65 bonds, that, if he objected to that feature of the bill, he must of course have been in favor of appropriating $11,000,000 to pay this debt on the one hand or else have been in favor of repudiating it on the other.

Mr. MORTON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. Of course, as my friend has said, I would not pay any contracts, either in 3.65 bonds or in money, unless it was legal and valid; but my objection to the 3.65-bond arrangement was this: that it was designed to pay contractors who had expected by the terms of their contract to be paid in money according to the face of the contract, and were compelled to receive in discharge of their contract, not money, not legal-tender notes, but bonds worth only sixty or seventy cents in the dollar. I thought that was in the nature of repudiation, though it was not so intended by the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad that the Senator has given his reasons now and here why he objected to the 3.65 bonds being issued, because both are based on things that did not exist. In the first place, these contractors knew perfectly well, and there was testimony to that effect, witness after witness testified, that they knew perfectly well at the time that they would not be paid in money, and several of the contractors themselves testified that in estimating their bids they made up their bids on the basis of eighty-five cents on the dollar.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will refresh his recollection he will remember that the chief engineer of the District, Mr. Cluss, testified that the estimates for the work upon which contracts were let were increased 25 per cent. on account of the certificates in which the contractors were to receive their payments. There were cases in which the increase was much larger than that, but the estimate of this official himself enhanced them 25 per cent. on account of their payment in all the kinds of yellow, green, and red-backed certificates that the contractors knew they would get.

Mr. MORTON. I would like to make this inquiry of my friend from Iowa in this connection. We are told that they expected to be paid not in money, but in certificates. Did they not expect the certificates to be paid, and how were they to be paid?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator. They probably expected that some time they would be paid, and they expected that the Senator from Indiana and other Senators on this floor would put their hands into the Treasury of the United States and pay these certificates rather than see this Government repudiate, because it had created this board of public works. That was what they anticipated. But I call the attention of my friend from Indiana to another fact existing at this time, that when this report of the joint committee was made in June, 1874, these identical certificates which we allowed to be converted into 3.65 bonds were selling on your streets at forty cents on the dollar; and it was a great source of complaint that poor men were being compelled to sacrifice their property at forty cents on the dollar, while rich men, who had millions of these District contracts, could hold their certificates in their pockets. Thereupon it was that these people pressed upon the committee, saying, "Whatever you do with this District, make some provision whereby we can receive payment for our honest toil."

Another thing that the Senator from Indiana forgets with reference to these 3.65 bonds, that is that they were not compulsory. No man was required to take these 3.65 bonds unless he chose to do so. It was a privilege and not compulsory. It was an additional security given to these people.

Mr. MORTON. I would ask my friend if any other form of payment was provided but that?

Mr. ALLISON. Not in that law; but the form of payment suggested by me a moment ago was open to these people, an appropriation by Congress, taxation upon the people of this District. My friend will remember that with all this we taxed these people 3 per cent. upon their property in that same act. Three per cent. of taxation was put upon these people at that time. Now, then, I would ask Senators if they want anything further by way of evidence of misgovernment in this city than the fact that a debt had been created here of $11,000,000; that the securities of the capital of your country were being hawked about your streets at forty cents on the dollar, indebtedness created by a board of public works authorized by Congress and our own appointees. These were the reasons——

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator speaks of eleven millions as if it were the whole debt.

Mr. ALLISON. I mean the floating debt.

Mr. THURMAN. In excess of the ten millions.

Mr. ALLISON. The debt upon the government here in addition to the ten millions of funded debt provided for by your statutes. And yet we are to be brought in here and arraigned by Senators for recommending such a monstrous proposition as the abolition of a government of this character.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HAMILTON. Speaking of forcing these depreciated bonds upon the contractors, I beg to call attention, if the Senator from Iowa will allow me, to the report of Mr. Hoxie. You will find it in the report of the commission for 1874, page 160. After mentioning his appointment and qualification, &c., he says this:

In conformity with the foregoing I assumed control on July 7, 1874, of the work of repair and improvement heretofore devolving upon the board of public works and organized the engineer's office for this purpose.

At this time contractors and others claiming contracts were at work with a view to establish their claims. The 3.65 bonds, provided for meeting the existing legal obligations of the District, had apparently induced many who had long since abandoned their work to resume without authority or directions.

He goes on to state that only about twenty contracts were in operation at the time this act passed, and he found forty odd when he came to take possession. The contractors had flocked from all quarters around, seeing that they were going to get 3.65 bonds, although they had abandoned their contracts absolutely.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a point to which I intended to call attention in a moment. The profits upon these contracts were so enormous that men could enter into these contracts and complete them and sell their certificates of indebtedness for them at from forty to fifty cents on the dollar; and that was done in numerous cases. Then it is true, as stated just now by the Senator from Texas—and I thank him for calling my attention to it, because I have noticed this fact also in the report—that the moment these 3.65 bonds were authorized, that moment every contractor, who had a contract dead or alive, beset these commissioners to have his contract renewed, because he saw of course that the moment these new commissioners would recognize the validity of that contract he could take his payment in 3.65 bonds and make a large profit. Therefore it is true, and I speak of it in mitigation of the construction put upon this law by these people, that the moment this law came into force, that moment all these old contractors rushed to these new commissioners and insisted that their contracts were not dead but still lived. If you will return to the report of Engineer Hoxie you will see that in many instances contracts were revived, although they were dead, by means of petitions by citizens of adjacent streets. There were many good reasons why the people should make such a petition. Under the system established by the board of public works the tax-payers of the city were compelled to pay two-thirds of the cost of these improvements, and a man would naturally say, "I have paid two-thirds of the cost of the beautiful improvement on K street, and I live only on M; why should I not have M street improved as well as K, because the government of the District pays two-thirds of the cost?" Therefore I appreciate the troubles and trials of our friends who came here and took charge of this government with reference to these contracts; but I must submit to them, notwithstanding all this, that it was the intention of this act—and I should have required the opinion of very eminent counsel before I would have departed from the manifest intention of the act—namely, to cut off the rapidly accumulating debts of the District of Columbia, these extravagant and reckless expenditures of the public money, because these expenditures must sooner or later be paid, either by taxation upon this District or by taxation upon the people of the United States. We cannot blink this if we would.

I was surprised at the Senator from California undertaking to array the amount of the debt in this District in comparison with other cities. I have not made that comparison. I only know that the debt of this District this day counting these 3.65 bonds, amounts to one-fourth of the entire cash value of the real estate in the District subject to taxation.

Now, I submit to Senators whether it is wise for us to tax these people or encourage them for a moment in creating a debt that even contingently involves such an obligation upon the tax-payers. By the last assessment the taxable real estate in this District is $93,000,000. The debt, as near as I can make it out, is about $23,000,000 or perhaps $24,000,000 including the 3.65 bonds.

But I objected at the time to this construction because I saw plainly where it would lead to, and I called the attention of the Senator from Indiana to it the other day in debate. His construction would authorize the District commissioners to repair and repave (because that is repairing according to the construction of these commissioners) almost every street in the District of Columbia; and Mr. Hoxie, the intelligent engineer, who makes this report of 1875, tells us that nearly all the wooden pavement and nearly all the concrete pavement of this city must at a very early moment be repaired. K street was repaired and a few other streets at a cost of $600,000. There are fifty-three and a half miles of wooden pavement in this District, and there are thirty-two or thirty-three miles of worthless or partially worthless concrete pavement in this District. Now, under the construction given to this law by leading Senators on this floor and by these commissioners, these eighty-six miles of pavement can be relaid under the law of June 20, 1874.

Mr. DAWES. And the United States give their bonds.

Mr. ALLISON. And the United States, as suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, issue their 3.65 bonds to pay therefor. I submit to Senators that I had a right in good faith to raise these questions without bringing down upon my head and upon the heads of the committee, who labored here for four months to relieve this District from its embarrassment, the maledictions of Senators because we chanced to raise a doubt about the authority of these commissioners.

Senators speak of the board of audit. I have no apologies for the board of audit. I do say that the board of audit ought not to have passed upon these certificates. They are equally to blame with reference to this matter, if any blame there be. In looking over these reports, which I have done since this debate began, I am glad to see that the commissioners of the District of Columbia notified every contractor that he must depend for his payment and for the final adjustment of his account upon the board of audit; that that board was to judge of whether or not these different items of expenditure came under the provisions of the act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. President, I do not wish to prolong this debate, nor will I undertake to read statutes or construe statutes at this late hour in the debate. I only call attention to some leading points which would justify us, or rather require us all to put a different construction upon this statute.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question right here?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. The construction which has been given to the law in reference to these bonds, and which I agree to, is that you have got to look to the statute on which the bond is based and to the face of the bond when it is in the hands of innocent parties. That being so, with a law on the statute-book that prohibits the indebtedness of the District becoming more than $10,000,000 standing unrepealed, all bonds issued in excess of that are void and not payable by the Government of the United States. Now I would ask the Senator while he is on his feet, if he will be kind enough, inasmuch as he helped frame the law under which these commissioners and the board of audit are acting, to turn to the section that repeals the law prohibiting any indebtedness in excess of $10,000,000. As I understand the rule in reference to repeal, there must be either an express provision repealing the former statute or the statute subsequent to this must be in conflict with this, or it is not repealed. I should like to see where the conflict is. From this discussion I cannot see it.

Mr. ALLISON. I have not the statute before me, but my impression is that there is a repealing clause in it. But whether there is or not I take it that this Government never will repudiate an obligation which is provided for in a law passed by itself, and these 3.65 bonds are all created under the act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. LOGAN. The repealing clause as I heard it read—I have not got the statute before me—was in regard to the board of public works. I did not hear, as the matter was argued by Senators on the floor, anything that was in conflict with this provision of the statute which prohibited a larger indebtedness than $10,000,000. If there is, as a matter of course the proposition as maintained by Senators on this floor, that the Government is responsible for this indebtedness, is correct so far as the legal proposition is concerned; but if this statute is not repealed, either by a subsequent inconsistent statute or by an act repealing it positively, then the Government is not responsible and the doctrine of caveat emptor would apply to these gentlemen. Then there is no obligation on the Government to pay one dollar, and every dollar of bonds issued over and above the $10,000,000 of debt and every dollar of indebtedness created by these gentlemen over that is in violation of a positive statute. The Senator from Massachusetts said last night that if a prohibition were put in this law he would indict men for violating it. If that is the rule I would like some Senator to show me in what particular the statute limiting the debt has been repealed before he asks me to vote at least for this $5,000,000 of increase that has been put upon us in one year by this board of audit or whatever it may be.

Mr. ALLISON. I can only speak for myself with reference to that statute. I believe that, inasmuch as the act of June 20, 1874, authorized the issuing of 3.65 bonds to cover certain debts and obligations, the Government of the United States is bound to stand by that statute, and that all statutes inconsistent with it, passed prior to that time, would to that extent be repealed. I do not think, therefore, that the Government of the United States can very well afford, after passing such a law, to say that, because they had limited the debt to $10,000,000 at a prior date, they would be authorized to repudiate the obligation.

Mr. LOGAN. I was not speaking in reference to what the Government could afford to do. I was only speaking of a legal proposition as to what we were obligated to do; not what we might feel that it might be well to do, but what we are required to do under the law.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand the Senator perfectly well.

Mr. LOGAN. I must confess I do not know much about statutes, and especially those in regard to the District of Columbia; but I find nothing in the later statute repealing any act of Congress theretofore passed, except the first section, which provides:

That all provisions of law providing for an executive, for a secretary for the District, for a Legislative Assembly, for a board of public works, and for a delegate in Congress in the District of Columbia are hereby repealed: Provided, That this repeal shall not affect the term of office of the present delegate in Congress.

That is all the repealing clause there is in the statute. Now, unless the section that authorizes these commissioners and the board of audit to go beyond the ten millions makes it inconsistent, it is not repealed, and that law stands. I cannot find anything of that character in the statute.

Mr. ALLISON. I cannot construe the law for the Senator or for any other Senator except myself. As I understand it, this law of 1874 repeals that of 1872 pro tanto; and therefore I find no difficulty on that score in standing by these 3.65 bonds. I believe in good faith we are bound to do it to the extent of their issue. I cannot give better reasons for it than were given by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.]

Now, before I close I wish to say one word——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me, in connection with what he has been saying, to read for the benefit of my friend from Illinois the language of the first part of the sixth section?

That it shall be the duty of the First Comptroller of the Treasury and the Second Comptroller of the Treasury of the United States, who are hereby constituted a board of audit, to examine and audit for settlement all the unfunded or floating debt of the District of Columbia and of the board of public works, hereinafter specified.

Then the section goes on to specify. It appears to me to be pretty plain that this latter act requiring this board to examine and audit all outstanding liabilities, without limit, of the particular class named, if the liabilities of that class named exceeded ten millions, this law must stand if they are to obey it, and not the old one.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont a question, then, for he is certainly a very good lawyer and a very technical one. According to the reasoning heretofore, if a prohibition is placed upon this law that we are now about to enact we cannot go beyond it. I ask the Senator to tell me how the board of public works got a debt in excess of the ten millions for the purpose of being audited; whether that was not in violation of law?

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Iowa can give that story.

Mr. ALLISON. That is a story very easily told, and I should like to have the Senator from Vermont tell it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I can tell it very quickly. It will be remembered that it was with the utmost difficulty that some Senators—I will not say who—succeeded in getting this ten-million limit in at all, to begin with; and when we got it in it was a good deal like other promises that we extract in statutes from people: those who were to obey the law did not care anything about it and they went on and incurred debts in violation of that law, in my opinion, unquestionably. But then on the report of my friend from Iowa and my friend from Ohio and the other gentlemen it was found that the District was almost bankrupted by this violation of law; but the debts had been incurred to people who had parted with their property and labor in honest good faith, and we all thought, I suppose, that the honor of the power that had charge of the District of Columbia—that is Congress who had imposed this government upon them—required that we should take some step to liquidate and get out of this slough of despond; and so we directed this board of audit to take everything that was outstanding of certain classes and find out how much it was and square off.

Mr. HAMILTON. Does the Senator from Vermont mean to include all that has been done since the organization of the District commission, as well as the debts that then existed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a different question which I have not addressed myself to at all.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is the same question. It is involved in the amount of these bonds now.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Vermont has referred to a part of the sixth section of the act of 1874 as repealing the limitation on the amount of the debt of the District. That section requires the board of audit to audit all debts of certain classes.

First, the debt evidenced by sewer certificates—

Sewer certificates in existence—

secondly, the debt purporting to be evidenced and ascertained by certificates of the auditor of the board of public works; thirdly, the debt evidenced by the certificates of the auditor and the comptroller of the District of Columbia; fourthly, claims existing or hereafter created for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by the board of public works; fifthly, claims for which no evidence of indebtedness has been issued, arising out of contracts, written or oral, made by or on behalf of the District of Columbia; sixthly, all claims for private property taken by the board of public works from the avenues, streets, and alleys of the cities of Washington and Georgetown.

That statute only applies to contracts prior to its enactment, and limits it to those. It provides expressly that the board shall audit such claims as exist and such as arise from contracts then made, oral or written, not for contracts made afterward, not for any additional work afterward, but contracts then existing, made by the board of public works, and not contracts made by this board of commissioners. That is the statute, and that is as far as it goes. Hence it is confined within the restriction and limitation provided in the statute prior to its enactment, and does not repeal directly or indirectly the previous statute of limitation. It applies only to that which existed. I was astonished and have been while listening to this debate at the argument of Senators as applied to this particular provision of the statute. I cannot read it as they have read it. There is not one word in it that applies to contracts made by these commissioners in order to increase the public debt or the debt of this District.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator and I do not differ as to the construction of the statute of June 20, 1874. I agree with him that it was confined to valid contracts existing and to the construction and preservation of work already begun and not finished. That is the plain construction of it, the plain sense of it, and it requires a lawyer, and a good one, to give advice that would justify any other construction. Of course there were such contracts existing at the time this report was made. The contracts that were made under the authority of the District Legislature were valid contracts. They were made in pursuance of appropriations by that District Legislature; they were within the limit of $10,000,000; therefore, they were valid contracts. The committee intended that they should be enforced.

Then there was another set of contracts, to wit, the sewer contracts, which were made afterward, but which were deemed necessary by the committee to protect and preserve the large amount of money already expended. This was another class of contracts provided for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much was the District debt at the time of the passage of this law and the report of this committee?

Mr. ALLISON. The District debt, funded and obligation—if I may use that word—was $18,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that it was above the $10,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. It was $8,000,000 above the $10,000,000 then, and that is what I complain of, that no attention in construing the validity or invalidity of these contracts was paid to the limit of $10,000,000 previously provided for, and that no attention was paid to the provision in the organic act of 1871 which required that appropriations should be made before contracts should be binding. That is what I have objected to, and only that.

Now, I desire to say one word with reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KERNAN.] I shall feel compelled to vote against that amendment. Why? Simply because, as was said by the Senator from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] awhile ago, it is probable that all these bonds have already been issued. If I had held a certificate, certainly during this debate I would have taken pains to convert it into a 3.65 bond before this law is enacted. Therefore, before it can become a law—because it must go back to the House of Representatives—these certificates will be converted into 3.65 bonds amounting to the $15,000,000. I want to place an absolute limitation upon the issuing of these bonds and an absolute limitation upon the certificates to be issued, so that hereafter no man, however high his character or pure his motives, can find an excuse, either upon the advice of eminent lawyers or eminent men otherwise, to increase the obligations created by the act of June 20, 1874.

Mr. MAXEY. I would ask the Senator from Iowa by what authority those dead and abandoned contracts were revived and then thousands of dollars expended upon those contracts thus resurrected?

Mr. ALLISON. It is beyond my ken to know how this resurrection took place or what human or divine power breathed into them the breath of life. I do not know how that was done; but it must have required an eminent lawyer, as has been said, to do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if the Senator from Iowa understood me as impugning the motives of the committee that framed this law, he was entirely mistaken. I have no doubt the committee did what they thought was the best at the time. I objected to the law then for what I regarded as a fundamental mistake, which I think now nearly everybody will subscribe to. That is to say, it abolished popular government, not that it abolished the old government as it then stood.

But what is the history of this debate? A simple proposition was presented to pay the interest of the bonds that had been already issued; and then my friend from Iowa and other Senators came forward and insisted that the commission had exceeded their authority and had given a wrong construction to the law. That was a very grave objection, and it was simply to meet that objection that this debate has sprung up.

If the act of 1872 limited the debt to $10,000,000, and afterward, in 1874, when that limit had been passed, Congress provided for auditing the excess and for paying that excess in 3.65 bonds, that was pro tanto a repeal of the original limit of $10,000,000 unquestionably.

Mr. President, I now call attention to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York, and I think the Senate ought to understand what is to be the effect of that amendment. In regard to these 3.65 bonds, on the original proposition to issue them, I differed somewhat with my friend from Iowa. If the contracts made by the board of public works were valid, or any of them, those contracts were made by authority of the Government of the United States. They were to be paid in money. It makes no difference whether they had depreciated and were being hawked about for forty cents on the dollar. That has nothing to do with it. If the original contracts were valid and were made by authority of the Government of the United States and were upon their face to be paid in money, a subsequent enactment requiring the contractors to take in payment a bond worth sixty cents on the dollar is, in my opinion, a violation of the contract, and there is no escape from it.

Mr. ALLISON. I quite agree with the Senator; and hence the committee did provide for the payment in money, out of the Treasury of the United States, of certain obligations which had been incurred to be paid in money. For example, the employés of this District, not one of whom had been paid for nine months prior to this investigation, were authorized to be paid out of an appropriation made by Congress. We endeavored to preserve intact every obligation of the United States, either express or implied.

Mr. MORTON. I was not speaking of the employés, the workingmen. This law did not provide for paying the workingmen, but it provided for executing the contracts that were valid, made by the authority of Congress, which on their face were to be paid in money. It provided for paying them in a bond worth only sixty or sixty-five cents on the dollar; and this I have always believed, without intending to find fault with anybody about it, was impairing the obligation of a contract, and that no State could have done, whatever Congress may do.

Now, I come to the effect of the amendment offered by my friend from New York, and it operates unjustly to the Government in another way. I do not agree with the argument of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] that the faith of the Government is now pledged so far as the holders of the old certificates are concerned growing out of contracts made by the board of public works. They will be glad enough to get clear of the 3.65 bonds; they never wanted to take them; and the very moment you abolish the provision to pay them in 3.65 bonds they are entitled to be paid in money and to be paid according to the face of their certificates. That is just what they want, so far as they are concerned. You have paid the most of them in 3.65 bonds. The effect of the amendment of my friend from New York will be to pay the rest of them in money at their face, because when you take away the payment in 3.65 bonds the faith of this Government stands pledged to pay them in money. They have got to be paid in some way. Congress may refuse to make an appropriation, because it may refuse to do anything; but when you take away the 3.65-bond arrangement there is but one thing left for you to do, and that is to pay these certificates at their face. That will be what they were entitled to in the first place, I admit, but you paid most of them the other way. Now, what is the effect of it in regard to the new contracts, contracts made by the present commission to carry out an old contract? I will suppose they have authority to make such contracts. Taking that for granted, they have made these contracts with the understanding on the part of the contractors that they were to be paid in bonds worth only sixty or seventy cents on the dollar. They made their bids accordingly. They put a higher price on their work than they would have done if they were to be paid in money. Now, when you repeal the 3.65-bond provision, what is left? Nothing but to pay them in money, unless you intend to repudiate the contract altogether. So that it operates unjustly in both ways; first, the 3.65-bond arrangement was unjust as to creditors, and the new debts having been contracted with the understanding they were to be paid in 3.65 bonds the holders get 30 per cent. more than they ever expected to get.

My friend from Michigan said that he would vote for the amendment of the Senator from New York for this reason: that he would suspend the issue of the 3.65 bonds until there was an investigation. That is not the effect. It does not suspend it merely; it abolishes it; and it will never be restored, in my judgment. How do you know there will be an investigation? The Senate makes no provision for an investigation. What will be the result of that investigation, who can tell? The simple fact is that when you abolish this bond arrangement as to contracts made by the commission, you pledge the faith of this Government to pay those contracts in money at their face, and the effect of it is to pay them 30 per cent. more than the contractors ever expected to get. Let us act understandingly. If we want to do that, let us do it; but let us know what is to be the effect of our action.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. EATON. Do I understand the Senator to say that the contracts made by the board of commissioners are contracts made to be paid in 3.65 bonds, and that if these bonds are not issued they must be paid their face in full in money.

Mr. MORTON. I certainly think that would be the effect of it as a plain proposition of law.

Mr. EATON. I think right the other way as a plain proposition of law.

Mr. MORTON. If the commissioners gave a contract to repair a street to carry out an old contract made by the board of public works, being authorized to do it—for I am assuming that they were authorized to do it, and I believe they were——

Mr. EATON. I do not.

Mr. MORTON. They were to be paid as the law then stood in a 3.65 bond. When you repeal the provision authorizing the creation of that bond, what is there left but to pay in money?

Mr. EATON. This is left; if I should make a contract with the honorable Senator from Indiana to pay him in wheat which was worth a dollar a bushel and I did not pay, I should have to pay him in money the value of the thousand or ten thousand bushels of wheat, I apprehend; and so the Government of the United States, in my opinion, would be bound to pay only the value of the 3.65 bonds, provided it is bound at all.

Mr. MORTON. My friend proposes then that the Government shall pay what the bond would be worth in the market, sixty cents to-day, sixty-five cents to-morrow, seventy cents the next day, and that the Government shall discredit its own bond by proving that it is worth less than its face. But my friend forgets this material fact; it is not like a case of adjusting a measure of damages on a contract in a suit at law where the contract is to be met by the payment of specific articles, because when you strike out the payment in this bond you have no tribunal to determine the measure of damages. There is but one thing left for you to do unless you legislate further, and that is to pay the face of that bond in money. That is what you ultimately will do, because if you once get clear of the 3.65 bond arrangement I do not believe Congress will ever be prevailed upon to restore it. So the proposition to repeal the 3.65 bond comes in just at a time when it injures the Government. The bond was first provided at a time when it injured the creditor. So it was wrong all the time.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask him a question? According to what we have before us the board of public works exceeded their authority—I presume no one will doubt that—to the amount, as the Senator from Iowa says, of $8,000,000. The Senate and the House of Representatives felt themselves obligated, as acting on the part of the Government, to vote that amount of money, thinking that the Government was bound for it although there was an express prohibition of their going beyond ten millions. The commission go beyond what the Senate and the House of Representatives intended, certainly according to the debate at that time. Now if you put a prohibition here on the same theory that the Senator from Indiana maintains now, and say in this law that they shall not exceed $15,000,000, and when Congress meets again they have exceeded it $5,000,000 more, according to the argument Congress will then be under obligation to pass a law paying that amount of money.

Mr. MORTON. I think not.

Mr. LOGAN. Why not? I understand the Senator to maintain that we are obligated to pay the $8,000,000 of liabilities incurred on the part of the board of public works, although there was an express provision in the statute prohibiting them from incurring that debt. We did do that. Now we have gone beyond that some $4,000,000, and he maintains that we are under obligation to pay that. Now if they go on and incur $5,000,000 more debt next year than we authorize, shall we not be under as much obligation to pay that as we are to pay this?

Mr. MORTON. If I understand this law it does not fix any limit at all to the claims that might be audited by the board of audit, but it simply enumerates the classes of claims. The question in controversy here is whether these contracts and these claims are contracts and claims arising under contracts made by the board of public works. That is a question of construction. They have decided it one way, and it has been argued the other way here in the Senate. But if we were now to fix a limit, say $15,000,000 or $18,000,000, that would cut off the power of the board of audit, because they would not be limited simply by the class of claims, as they now are, but would be limited by a fixed amount. Now they are only limited by the class of claims, and the only question is whether these claims come under the enumeration made by the law.

Mr. LOGAN. Let the Senator understand me. This limitation here is upon the amount; it is not a limitation at all upon their going ahead and executing contracts. It is only a limitation upon the amount of bonds, and does not prohibit them from going on and completing contracts under this law under the same construction that they have given. Hence, if that construction obtain they may go on and finish contracts amounting to millions next year, and you are under the same obligation to meet them you are to provide for these now. There is no limitation upon the contracts in this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I propose to offer, if it is in order, an amendment as additional to the amendment of the Senator from New York——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order; there is an amendment pending to an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I give notice that, when it is in order, if the fortunate time should come, I shall propose to add the following words:

And there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia.

I think, when we had the old law and the board of public works, just as my friend from Illinois, if I understand him, thinks, that all contracts made after they had got up to the limit of $10,000,000, with anybody, no matter how honest that person might be, were contracts that were against the statute and were void in law; and it was the misfortune of the honest contractor—if there were any such, as undoubtedly there were—that he contracted in ignorance of a fact which he was bound to inquire into before he made his contract, and no legal obligation existed on the part of the District of Columbia, or on the part of Congress, to take any steps for his redress at all.

That was the condition in which we found ourselves when the committee of 1874 reported this law. They reported, as I understood, in order to do natural equity, to wind up this continuous running in debt and get out of the difficulty, not by cutting off at the ten-million limit, but by cutting off on the limit of taking things as they existed with honest contractors who had made valid contracts so far as the contracts themselves were concerned.

Mr. LOGAN. Contracts existing at the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Contracts existing at the time, and also to provide for liability that might be created for work done thereafter growing out of an existing contract; but whether these gentlemen have done things which did not grow out of existing contracts, I do not know. If they have done things which grew out of existing contracts beyond what they might do under the second section out of taxes, for repairs, &c., which of course is another thing, then they have violated the law; but, if they have acted within this classification, it is perfectly plain to my mind that the ten-million limit had nothing to do with it. I may be wrong; I fear that I am, as my friend from Illinois does not think with me; but that is my view. As I view it, we all intended not to turn adrift these $8,000,000, for which work had been done and which were reported as being outstanding in excess of the ten millions, but to provide for that and to provide also for some work being done which would also be in excess of the ten millions because that had been reached, and on the ten-million limit not a step could be taken of any kind. They could not finish anything, a sewer or anything else. So we provided that they might go on, but they should keep within that range of subjects which grew out of the existing state of things and for the preservation of those things that would go to decay without action; and upon that we put no limit. Then we provided a board of audit to get in all the claims of these various classes and certify them.

The creditor who had a claim was not forced by the bill to bring it before the board of audit. He had a right to stand out and say, "I will not submit to this shave of 30 per cent.," that my friend from Indiana dwells upon. He was not coerced in the least degree. The difficulty was that there was no means known to the law by which this outstanding creditor could get any pay at all. In the first place, he would have to meet the question that his contract beyond the ten-million limit was void to begin with, and then he would go out of court. In the second place, supposing it were not void or we had waived that by this statute, and we do not compel him to come in, what is he to do? He can easily keep his debt independent of this board of audit entirely, in whatever form it existed, and trust to his power in the courts to compel the municipality to pay it, as in the New England States he could by a levy upon the private property of the citizens as soon as he got his judgment, and get his pay, or he could take his certificate. Taking his certificate did not change his rights a hair. He could still hold the certificate and not take his bond. He is not required to take the bond. The only thing on the subject of the bond is that the commissioners of the sinking fund are authorized to exchange these bonds for these certificates, face for face.

That is all.

Now this man having got his certificate gets out of the dilemma of the ten-million limit, and has got on solid ground. How is he to get his pay? He can sue the District of Columbia unquestionably, now represented by the board of commissioners instead of by an ordinary municipal corporation. He sues them in their official capacity and he recovers judgment, as I do not see how he can fail to do; but when he comes to the question of how he is to get his pay it is quite a different thing.

Mr. MORTON. He can levy on the office furniture.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He can levy on the office furniture. In New England, as I say, he could levy on the real estate or the personal property of any person residing there. I do not know that the old laws of Maryland, which have furnished the civil code for the District of Columbia, provide for that. I do not know that they do not provide for it. Having a little abiding-place here myself, I hope the law is not so, [laughter,] and that the furniture of the commissioners will have to respond, instead of the little shanty that I live in.

But that is the attitude of the case. Therefore it does not appear to me that we are guilty of any breach of faith—that is my present impression; I do not state it very confidently—in saying, We will issue no more bonds. Whether we should not be bound, as having the supreme legislative power here, to provide that in some way the property of the District of Columbia should pay its honest debts, is another question. I think we should unquestionably. But in order to get out of the present difficulty, as we do not wish to guarantee that the United States will continue without limit to issue 3.65 bonds, I think with my friend from New York that we ought to stop it. Having stopped it, I think, as my friend from Illinois has said, that will do no good unless we also stop the creation of further liabilities. To do that I propose to say to these commissioners, who, I believe, have endeavored to manage these operations, as difficult and complicated as they were, with the utmost good faith and intelligence, From this time, gentlemen, you must go on with the funds you have; the taxation which is to be imposed upon this people, and to be contributed to by the United States according to our judgment of what is a fair proportion for us to contribute, must supply the necessities of this city. In that view, when I get an opportunity I shall move the amendment I have indicated.

Mr. MAXEY. I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Vermont. The purpose of his amendment, I understand, is to limit the creation of further indebtedness by the board. Is that it?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not precisely to prevent the creation of further indebtedness, because these commissioners may find a hole in the street that is dangerous to life, and they may not have money in hand at the moment to pay for filling it up; but if they have taxes within the limits of the appropriation, so that, without increasing the aggregate of indebtedness, they may go on and keep things in order, they may do it. But my proposition simply is that the aggregate indebtedness shall not be increased; so that, from this time forth, the taxes and other sources of income from the District shall provide for its wants.

Mr. MAXEY. Then I ask if the act of June 20, 1874, does not limit the indebtedness to ten millions?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It did not limit the indebtedness to ten millions. That was a prior act when the old board of public works was in operation; and the act of 1874, as I read it, is a plain authority to do the specific acts that are mentioned without regard to the ten-million limit.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I am only going to detain the Senate a single moment, for I am very much in hopes that we may get a vote. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the discrimination he makes between the bonds issued and the certificates issued. I agree almost entirely with what the Senator from Michigan said in regard to the legal relations between the Government and the bondholder, but I do not quite agree, as I understand the facts in the case, with his statement of the relations as to the certificates already issued. As I understand the legal relations existing between the Government and the holders of the certificates, they are in law and in equity identical with those of the holders of the bonds. The faith of the Government is pledged to the redemption of the certificates in the way of payment in bonds, as I maintain, precisely as they are to pay the bonds. My reason is this: They are negotiable, necessarily, in their character, and I think I can satisfy my honorable friend by a brief reference to the statutes. These liabilities——

Mr. NORWOOD. Will the Senator yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, sir. I shall be through in a moment. These liabilities were to be audited by a board of audit created by the Government, and this is the language:

> Said board of audit shall also issue to each claimant a certificate signed by each of said board and countersigned by the comptroller.

That was to be the evidence of indebtedness on the part of the Government. Now what is to be done with it?

> And the said sinking fund commissioners are hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par for like sums of any class of indebtedness in the preceding section of this act named, including sewer taxes or assessments paid, evidenced by certificates of the auditing board provided for in this act.

I have a certificate here. The process is this: first any person having a claim goes to the board of audit; the board of audit issue this certificate; when the certificate is delivered to the commissioners of the sinking fund they are obliged to issue a bond for it. This happens to be a certificate in the hands of a third person. Does the honorable Senator doubt that that third person is entitled to the bond?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. A certificate instead of a bond?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This is a certificate about which I am speaking. The certificate upon the face of it refers to this act and the party holding it is the owner of it in the sense of this act. He takes it to the commissioners and he asks for his bond.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator from Maine allow me to ask him a question? Supposing it should turn out (a hypothetical case) that a man has got his certificate, and after he has got it it is discovered that he procured by fraud, by imposition, that he had not done any work, would there not be a defense to it in his hands or the hands of his assignee? Whereas if he gets a bond it may go to a bona fide holder against whom such a defense could not be made.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the very proposition I have already urged, that it is negotiable in its character and effect by the construction of this statute. He is an innocent holder; he is a bona fide holder for a good consideration, and you cannot examine the question as against him; that is my point.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you mean the payee of the certificate?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No, I do not. This is a certificate in the hands of a third party, an assignee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you regard that as in the nature of a negotiable security?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do under the statute.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think that will do.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think it is negotiable under this statute. The statute is broad enough to cover any claim that has been audited by these commissioners in anybody's hands. That is my argument. There are no negotiable words in this certificate, I know; but it is the necessary effect of the statute itself. The statute is broad enough to require the issue of this certificate to any person who presents the evidence of a claim against the Government.

One word more. I understood my honorable friend from Michigan to say that this certificate would be evidence of indebtedness undoubtedly against the Government at its face value; and I suppose he would not question that the holder of it might have his remedy in the Court of Claims; but I understood him to say that the measure of damages would be the value of the 3.65 bond in which it was to be paid, or for the payment of which provision is made in this statute. Am I right in supposing that to be the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I did not say a word on the subject of the amount of damages. If the Senator wishes my opinion on that now, I would say that he could only recover what the bonds were worth in the market at the time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My answer to that is that in the first place this statute provides for the auditing of all these claims and the issuing of certificates. It does not require, when that is done, the claimant, the holder of a certificate, to take a 3.65 bond in payment. That is optional with him. If he chooses to hold the certificate, he holds it as an evidence of debt, trusting to the Government for its payment; and whenever he chooses to bring that to the attention of the Government, it will be optional of course with the Government to make its appropriation; but it is an evidence of indebtedness for its full face and the Government cannot require him to take the 3.65 bond or its equivalent, I submit. Therefore it seems to me that it is a very doubtful economy indeed to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York; but as I am anxious to get a vote upon this bill I do not propose to argue it further.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I have no question in regard to the issue of these certificates; and if certificates were issued under this statute, subsequent to its taking effect, I do not think they could be issued in a negotiable form. I see nothing in the statute which gives them the properties of commercial paper or negotiable paper. Hence I think that any equities existing between the original holder and the Government might be shown for the purpose of defeating their validity in whosesoever hands they may come. Not being negotiable, they must come into the hands of third persons merely by assignment, and that assignment should appear upon the back of the instrument, and would convey but an equitable right. It would not therefore prevent the Government from setting up any defense as between the original parties. This shows, in my view, the propriety of stopping the issue of bonds for these certificates until the whole thing has been investigated. The payment of them can then be provided for if they are found to be valid, either by the issue of further bonds or by any other provision the Government may see fit to make.

Mr. NORWOOD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 2, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Journal as read?

Mr. CONGER. I notice that in the Journal as read the Clerk has noted the time when the motion to adjourn was made, but not the time when the motion to adjourn was actually agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The recollection of the Chair is that the requirement of the rule relates to the time when the motion to adjourn is submitted.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the object was to tell when the House did actually adjourn.

The SPEAKER. No doubt that is the object.

Mr. CONGER. Other business might intervene after the motion to adjourn was submitted, so that half an hour might elapse before the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. After the motion to adjourn is submitted, usually only such business intervenes as happens to be upon the Speaker's table, not of importance and having no relation to the current business of the House. The rule upon the subject is: "The hour at which every motion to adjourn is made shall be entered upon the Journal." The Clerk has literally followed the rule of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I was not aware of that rule; I thought the time when the House actually adjourned was the time to be noted.

The Journal as read was then approved as correct.

ELECTION CONTEST—BROMBERG VS. HARALSON.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the report of the supervisors of the congressional elections in 1874 for the first congressional district of Alabama; which was referred to the Committee of Elections.

COMMERCIAL TREATY WITH FRANCE.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for consideration at this time the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, owing to the fact that no treaty regulating commercial affairs between the United States and the republic of France exists, the productions of the United States are not received into the ports of France on as favorable terms as are the productions of other nations; and whereas the citizens of the United States are placed at a great disadvantage in comparison with citizens of other states in competing for the trade of the republic of France on account of the discriminations aforesaid: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requesting the President to negotiate a commercial treaty between the United States and the republic of France placing the citizens of the United States on as favorable a footing as the citizens of other and more favored nations in respect to duties and charges imposed upon imports into the republic of France.

Mr. CONGER. I think the recital in the preamble is not strictly correct. I think that by an old treaty between the United States and France it is provided that in all future time the same regulations should operate upon importations of goods from this country as from the most favored nations.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The gentleman is in error upon that precise point; there are other nations more favored than the United States.

Mr. CONGER. I think the treaty with France required that the regulations in relation to the United States should be the same as for the most favored nation. I only question the strict correctness of the assertion in the preamble.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There is no incorrectness in that.

The preamble and resolution were adopted.

ELIZABETH A. SANFORD.

Mr. AINSWORTH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1799) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Sanford, widow of M. W. Sanford; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

REVISED STATUTES FOR REPORTERS OF DEBATES.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee of Accounts:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House furnish each of the official reporters of the House one copy of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. Before entering upon the regular order this morning, the Chair desires to inquire of the House if there be any objection to taking from the Speaker's table and referring to the appropriate committees the bills and resolutions from the Senate?

There was no objection.

JOINT RULES.

The first business on the Speaker's table was the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the joint rules of the Senate and House of Representatives in force at the close of the last session of Congress, except the twenty-second joint rule, be, and the same are hereby, adopted as the joint rules of the two Houses at the present session.

COMMISSIONER OF TUNIS AT THE CENTENNIAL.

The next business upon the Speaker's table was the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis.

Mr. KASSON. Owing to the rapidly approaching time when this commissioner must enter upon his duties, if at all, I would suggest that the House concur in the amendment of the Senate, unless there be objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is objection.

The joint resolution and Senate amendment were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the joint resolution (S. R. No. 3) authorizing the acceptance by G. Harris Heap, consul of the United States at Tunis, of the trust of the commissioner of the Bey of Tunis at the international exhibition of 1876 at Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

CIRCUIT COURT IN CALIFORNIA, OREGON, AND NEVADA.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 53) fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the district of California, Oregon, and Nevada; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ACCEPTANCE OF PRESENTS BY GEORGE P. MARSH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NAVAL MONUMENT.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 83) to provide for the completion and location of the naval monument; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 124) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of the alcoholic and fermented liquor traffic and manufacture; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the reference of this bill to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FRYE. This subject is already before the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the bill should go to the Judiciary Committee, to which a large number of petitions on the subject have already been referred.

Mr. MORRISON. They ought not to have been so referred. This bill comes from the Finance Committee of the Senate.

Mr. GARFIELD. The bill has relation to the temperance question, not to any question of taxation.

The motion of Mr. MORRISON was agreed to, and the bill was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

S. K. THOMPSON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 160) for the relief of S. K. Thompson; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PEASLEY & M'CLARY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 191) for the relief of Peasley & McClary, of Nashua, New Hampshire; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

WITNESSES BEFORE MILITARY COURTS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 202) to secure the attendance and payment of witnesses before military courts; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

HEIRS OF JAMES SINCLAIR.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 225) granting six hundred and forty acres of land to the widow and heirs of James Sinclair, deceased; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CUSTOM-HOUSE LOT, ROCKLAND, MAINE.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 235) providing for the sale of part of the custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

MILITARY ROAD IN OREGON.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LAND OFFICE IN UTAH TERRITORY.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 279) to establish a land office in the southern part of Utah Territory to be known as the Beaver district, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CONSULATES AT AIX-LA-CHAPELLE, ETC.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 305) changing the location of the consulates at Aix-la-Chapelle, and at Omoa and Truxillo; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

NATHANIEL G. SMITH.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 358) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

POST-ROUTES IN TEXAS.

The next business on the Speaker's table was the bill (S. No. 360) to establish certain post-routes in the State of Texas; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider all these various references, and to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

IDAHO ELECTION CONTEST—FENN VS. BENNETT.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. On behalf of the Committee of Elections, I ask that the papers in the contested-election case of Fenn vs. Bennett, from the Territory of Idaho, be ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, the order was made.

KENDRICK & AVIS AND OTHERS.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1800) for the relief of Kendrick & Avis and Kuner, Zisemann & Zott from assesssment under the revenue laws; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

KANSAS INDIAN LANDS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at twenty-two minutes before one o'clock, and the House resumes the consideration of the bill reported yesterday from the Committee on Public Lands by the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN,] entitled "A bill (H. R. No. 797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale." The gentleman from Kansas is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GOODIN. Mr. Speaker, in reporting this bill I desire to submit a few words respecting the subject-matter of it.

The lands embraced in the bill amount to about 213,000 acres. Originally there were comprised within the limits of the reservation of the Kansas Indians 256,000 acres, of which amount 43,000 acres have been disposed of under the treaty of June 7, 1860, at an average price of $1.50 per acre. This bill proposes to make sale of the residue of the lands to actual settlers only for the benefit of the Indians. In pursuance of an act of Congress, approved May 8, 1872, the Secretary of the Interior caused the lands to be appraised, and parties were then authorized to purchase at such appraisement. The lands were appraised at from four to seven dollars per acre, making an average of about $5 an acre. The country was far more prosperous then than now, and yet it was found that the appraisement was too high and the lands could not be sold; and now in the present depressed condition of the country purchasers cannot be found to take them at the old appraisement. There are many poor people who have settled upon this tract and are, alike with the Indians, anxious for such a valuation to be fixed upon the lands as will enable them to be sold.

The bill which I have reported from the Committee on the Public Lands is substantially the same as that reported at the last session and which passed the House, but did not reach the Senate in time for consideration, as I am informed, by that body. This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to investigate the appraisement to which I have referred, and if, in his opinion, the same is too high, to cause a re-appraisement to be made. I have examined the subject with some care, and find no legal objections to the passage of the bill. I would furthermore add that I am satisfied that its passage would be a measure of justice to the settlers upon these lands, and would also be of benefit to the Indians, as the lands cannot be sold under the present appraisement. As these lands are situate in the district of my colleague, [Mr. BROWN,] and as he has bestowed a good deal of attention upon this subject, I yield to him, hoping that he will be able to give the House any information required concerning the provisions of the bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill, as has already been explained by my colleague who reported it from the Committee on Public Lands, has for its sole object the re-appraisement of the Kansas Indian reservation, in Kansas, and its sale to actual settlers at reasonable prices and upon reasonable terms. This reservation, which consists of some 200,000 acres of land in central Kansas, is held by the Government of the United States pursuant to a treaty made with the Kansas tribe of Indians in 1860 for sale for the benefit of that tribe. At that time the Indians were living on what is called their diminished reserve, consisting of about 80,000 acres, which was withheld from sale until the tribe should seek and obtain homes elsewhere. The balance or the trust lands were offered for sale, and the better portion sold at a very low figure between 1860 and 1872. In the latter year, the Indians having removed to their new homes in the Indian Territory, the unsold portions of the trust lands and the diminished reserve were appraised and offered for sale; but, owing to the high valuation placed upon the lands and the illiberal terms of payment, they failed to sell, and with the exception of a few scattered tracts the whole reserve to-day remains unsold. After this appraisement in the fall of 1873 came the great financial crisis, which so affected values in all sections of the country, followed in 1874 in Kansas by the terrible visitation of the locusts, which destroyed our crops and left the State, as it were, almost a desert. These two calamities had the effect of depreciating all real estate in Kansas to a very great extent, so much so that this reservation offered to-day under the appraisement of 1872 presents to the purchaser the anomalous spectacle of raw prairie lands being offered for sale at a higher price than well-improved farms equally well located can be purchased for.

From 1866 until 1873 I resided within twenty miles of this reservation, and business often calling me upon it, I became thoroughly acquainted with it as well as with other lands in that vicinity, and having examined the appraisement I can from personal knowledge state that the lands are appraised from 30 to 40 per cent. too high, and that even the railroad lands which are sold on eleven years' time can be bought at a much lower price than this reservation under this appraisement. Nor is this all. Under the appraisement improvements upon the lands are also appraised, and, if anything, at a more exorbitant figure than the lands themselves. Houses which originally built of our native cottonwood and hackberry lumber have stood the weather and storms of twenty years are appraised at as high a value as fair houses could now be built for of the best material. I saw one building at the agency appraised at $1,840 which I would consider dear at one-third that price, and the mission buildings are in the same condition. The stone houses built in 1861 to improve and civilize the Kaws, and which they immediately utilized as stables after selling off the doors, windows, and floors, and which are in many instances unroofed and have been for years, are appraised at from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty dollars apiece, although many of them are of no earthly use to the occupants of the land except perhaps as stables; and, worse than all, old breakings of the prairie sod made years ago and grown up with sunflowers and weeds are appraised at from three to four dollars an acre, although every person acquainted with agriculture knows that such breakings are not only valueless but a positive detriment to a farm. No one objects to paying for the land and the improvements what they are really worth, but the settlers and those interested in their behalf do object to their being compelled to pay more than a fair price for what they get, and under this bill these improvements will be re-appraised as well as the lands. These settlers went upon these lands as soon as the Indians had removed, with the understanding that they were to be sold to actual settlers at reasonable prices, and here they have remained. They have built houses, inclosed fields, and raised crops; they have made farms, and now to the number of at least a thousand are living on the reservation. Like all pioneers they are poor men, but they have energy and determination, and feel that their all is bound up in the passage of this bill, and unless it passes many of them must abandon their homes and the hopes of years, while others who have invested too much to abandon will struggle on trusting eventually to be able to pay out, and many failing in the end. Of this class Congress in its late legislation has ever been the friend. It has invited him to settle the western prairies, and by the passage of the homestead law it has enunciated the grand principle that to him who bears the hardships and privations of frontier life, who by his labor reclaims the wilderness and makes that valuable which otherwise would be practically valueless, should belong the soil itself; and while in this case we recognize the rights of the Indian and desire justice done to him, we trust Congress will not forget this principle so as to do injustice to the settler.

We have endeavored in this bill to do justice to the Indian. We have, in order that even the possibility of wrong might be avoided, provided that the Secretary of the Interior shall inquire into the correctness of the old appraisement, and make a new one only on condition it appears that the lands have been appraised too high. We have also provided for bonds against waste in case timbered lands are sold, for a rate of interest on deferred payments fully as high as the Government pays for the use of Indian funds, and which is satisfactory to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; and finally, to make all secure, have provided that no titles pass to the purchasers until the whole purchase-money, principal and interest, is paid. We desire, as the bill states, to have the lands sold at their cash value, neither more nor less. We claim that it is an advantage to the Indian as well as to the settler to have this bill pass. It is no benefit to him to have these lands unsold. He and his creditors, among whom especially is the United States, which has advanced large sums to this tribe, ought to desire to have the matter settled and the land disposed of. No one believes large tracts should be held unsold for the benefit of anybody, and I do not think Congress would favor Indian speculators as against settlers any more than it would white speculators. Our State and the counties in which the land lies have an interest that these lands do not remain untaxable, but come in to bear their shares of the public burdens, and to the settler, as I have already shown, it is a vital matter that he may know what to provide for in the future.

This bill in nearly its present shape passed this House at the last Congress, and only failed in the Senate through lack of time. No parties are interesting themselves against it. The Indian superintendency in Kansas and the Quaker agents, who are supposed to be the special friends of the Indian, have never interposed an objection, though they have been consulted by friends of the measure, and it has been well known in our State that this bill would be pushed at this session. The Secretary of the Interior last spring gave his virtual sanction to the measure by stopping the offering of the reserve for sale, in order that Congress might act in the premises. Carefully guarded as the measure is, I certainly can see no ground to oppose the bill, and sincerely trust that it will pass.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. BROWN] a question touching the provisions of the pending bill.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. Contrary to the custom in the conveyance of lands to the United States the proposition is here made to interpose a title back to the United States together with notes secured by bond, thus putting the United States in the position and subject to the liability at law of a common transaction between individuals in real estate. I refer to these words, "which payments shall be secured by notes payable to the United States and by mortgage on the premises." The question I desire to put is whether the bill will not be much more perfect and much more in accord with precedent by striking out the words which I have read, so the section will then read, after prescribing five equal annual payments, "that the Secretary of the Interior shall withhold title until the last payment is made." The United States wants no security but the land. It does not want to be troubled with the management of promissory notes. I find the amendment is acceptable to the gentleman who reported the bill from the Committee on Public Lands, and I hope it will be adopted by the House.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Neither my colleague, [Mr. GOODIN,] who reported this bill from the Committee on the Public Lands, nor myself, has any objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Iowa. The woods were included in this bill because they were put in at the last session by the then Committee on the Public Lands. That is the only reason they have been included in here now.

Mr. FORT. I desire to ask the gentleman from Kansas to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I yield to the gentleman if he desires any explanation in regard to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. FORT. I should like to know what is the average valuation put upon these lands?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. They are appraised from three and a half to seven dollars an acre. Some, nearer the town, have been appraised much higher, but I think the average will be from five to six dollars an acre.

Mr. FORT. Have the Indians abandoned these lands and made application to have them sold?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. The Indians are living now in the Indian Territory. They have left this reservation, and it is now held by the Government in trust to be sold for their benefit.

Mr. FORT. Have they applied to have these lands sold?

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Yes, sir; again and again. I understand they are perfectly satisfied to have them sold in the way here provided.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. If my colleague will permit me, I will make a brief statement. The Government purchased lands for these Indians in the Indian Territory. At both sessions of the last Congress this House appropriated money to locate these Indians there and pay for the lands which they now occupy. The money paid by the Government for those lands it was provided should be repaid from the price received from the proceeds of the sale of these lands in Kansas. In my judgment it will take nearly all the money which will be received from the sale of these lands in Kansas to actual settlers to repay the Government of the United States.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he should still further amend, to carry out his object, by striking out lines 22 and 23 of section 1.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to complete the amendment to which I have already called attention. At the end of the first section I move to strike out the words "and give his notes with a lien on the land to secure the purchase-money on the terms aforesaid." Now it will be evident those words should be stricken out as a complement to the others which I have moved to strike out.

Mr. GOODIN. I do not object to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DUNNELL. I insist that the gentleman from Iowa shall make his motion in writing, so that we may all understand exactly what it is.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Minnesota insists on his demand, the amendment must be reduced to writing.

Mr. KASSON. I send my amendment to the Clerk's desk so that it may be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of the first section, in lines 22 and 23, strike out the words "and give his notes with a lien on the land to secure the purchase-money thereof on the terms aforesaid."

Section 2, lines 13, 14, and 15, strike out the words "which payments shall be secured by notes payable to the United States and by mortgage on the premises."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. There is one other amendment which ought to be made on page 3, where it reads "shall be subject to entry, &c., by actual settlers." I would be glad to have the word "only" inserted after the word "settlers," so as to exclude all possibility of these lands going into the hands of speculators.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. That is the object of this bill, and what we want to secure, beyond all doubt.

Mr. KASSON. So I understand.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I only desire to make a single remark in relation to the bill now before the House. I recollect distinctly that the Committee on Public Lands in the last Congress gave to this subject very careful consideration. It was before the committee a number of sessions. The history of the entire affair was gone over very carefully, and the Committee on Public Lands at the last Congress was unanimous in recommending the passage of a bill similar to this one. It was evident that these lands had been appraised at too high a figure.

It was very evident that it was neither in the interest of prospective settlers nor in the interest of the Indians that these lands should be held at the appraisal made upon them; and we were clearly of opinion that it was not only in the interest of the State of Kansas and in the interest of the settlers, but also of the Indians themselves, that these lands should be again appraised. I assure the House that there cannot be any safer proposition than is made by this bill.

Mr. GOODIN. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute, as amended, was adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill, as amended, may be again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN,] who has reported this bill, whether any other persons than actual settlers are authorized to become purchasers of this land or any part of it?

Mr. GOODIN. They are not.

Mr. HOLMAN. The sale is expressly limited to actual settlers?

Mr. GOODIN. It is expressly limited to them. But I have no objection, if the gentleman so desires it, to insert the word "only."

The SPEAKER. That word has already been inserted.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. GOODIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REORGANIZATION OF THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. McCRARY. The Committee on the Judiciary have had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1563) re-organizing the judiciary of the United States, and have unanimously directed me to report a substitute for that bill, and to recommend its passage.

The bill is of considerable importance, and numerous gentlemen are desirous of examining it, and wish that a time shall be fixed in the future for its consideration. I report the substitute, and ask that it be read by title at this time, and that it be printed, and fixed for consideration at a future day.

The title of the substitute (H. R. No. 1798) was read, as follows:

A bill to re-organize the judiciary of the United States.

Mr. McCRARY. On behalf of the committee I suggest that the following order be made with reference to the consideration of this bill:

That the substitute be printed, and made the special order for consideration in the House on Wednesday next at two o'clock, and from day to day at the same hour until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business except regular appropriation bills.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Iowa will consent to postpone the consideration of this bill a week later, so that we may have ample opportunity to examine its provisions. The subject-matter is a very important one.

Mr. McCRARY. I desire to give all the opportunity that any gentleman desires; and if that will be satisfactory I will say one week from next Wednesday. I desire, however, to have the bill considered as early as possible.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. If this order be adopted might it not interfere with reports of a very important nature from the Committee on Ways and Means?

Mr. McCRARY. I have excepted the regular appropriation bills.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I should like that reports of the Committee of Ways and Means should also be excepted; as it is at least possible that there are matters to be reported by that committee on which the House might be called upon to act summarily, and with which this order might interfere.

Mr. McCRARY. I do not think that the debate on this bill will be at all protracted. It is the unanimous report of the committee, and I think when gentlemen examine it it will meet with general approval. It involves the appointment of no additional judges, and so far from increasing expense it is a measure of economy and retrenchment. I think there will be no conflict between the Judiciary Committee and the Committee of Ways and Means with regard to the control of the floor.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I had supposed that the bill involved the necessity of a reconstruction of the organization of the whole judiciary of the United States.

Mr. CAULFIELD. O, no!

Mr. McCRARY. It does not involve that.

Mr. BANKS. The order introduced by the gentleman from Iowa, representing the Judiciary Committee, restricts the consideration of the House to the substitute. The substitute can only come in as an amendment to the original bill, and the bill should be included in the order.

Mr. McCRARY. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. The order will be made to read accordingly.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I object to the consideration of the bill being ordered to run from day to day until disposed of. I am willing to give it that day, but not from day to day.

The question being taken on Mr. McCRARY's motion as modified, it was agreed to—ayes 93, noes not counted.

Mr. McCRARY moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McCRARY. On behalf of the committee I also desire to submit a report in writing, expressing the views of the committee in reference to this bill, and I move that the report be printed and that it do lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF THE CLERK OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. KNOTT. I am unanimously instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report the following resolution and ask its adoption:

Resolved, That the clerk of the Committee on the Judiciary be, and he is hereby, allowed for his services $5 per day, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will not the gentleman from Kentucky consent that that resolution shall be referred to the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. KNOTT. I do not think the reference at all necessary. The House must be aware from the amount of business referred to the Committee on the Judiciary that the time of the clerk of that committee is as much occupied as that of any other employé in the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. What is his present pay?

Mr. KNOTT. Only $4 per day.

The question was taken; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRACTICE IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. KNOTT also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 934) regulating the practice in United States circuit and district courts as to the time and manner of instructing juries and arguing the cause.

The bill was read. It provides that the circuit and district courts of the United States, in all criminal trials and civil causes other than equity and admiralty causes, shall conform to the practice existing at the time in like trials and causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, both as to the time and manner of instructing the jury and conducting the argument of the cause before the jury, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. KASSON. I would like the gentleman from Kentucky to state whether in the States where judges are now instructed in writing this bill would not require all the judges of the United States courts also to put their instructions in writing? If that is the effect it is a very important change in the practice. If the gentleman will be kind enough to explain what effect it is designed to produce, I shall be glad to hear him.

Mr. KNOTT. I did not hear the gentleman's question.

Mr. KASSON. This bill provides not only in relation to juries, but that the instructions given to the juries shall conform in the mode of giving them in the United States courts to the practice in the States where those courts are held. Now, in some of the States the law requires the judge to give all his instructions in writing to the jury. That is not the case in the United States courts, and I doubt very much whether it is the desire of the lawyers in the House to require a United States judge to give all his instructions in writing. My inquiry is whether this bill is designed to require that they shall do so.

Mr. KNOTT. Manifestly the bill is intended to accomplish precisely what its language imports. Where the State law requires the instructions to be given in writing in the State courts, that same practice is to prevail in the United States courts; and when the law authorizes or requires a verbal charge, the practice in the United States courts must conform to that practice. And further, sir, I would say that this bill is reported back with the unanimous approval of the Committee on the Judiciary, who I believe have with myself taken some pains to ascertain the feelings of the members of the bar on this floor on this subject.

I know that in some localities there has been considerable complaint on account of the judges of the United States courts refusing to conform to the established rule of practice in the State courts, and I cannot conceive that this bill will work any hardship on anybody.

Mr. KASSON. Then I would like to inquire of the gentleman why if it is a good rule in one State it is not in all to require all instructions to the jury to be given in writing. And if we are going to regulate the judges, why should we so regulate them as to subordinate them in one State to one rule and in another to another?

I do not know that I should object to this bill if it would make the practice uniform in all the States, but it seems to me that if there is any usefulness for the protection of suitors that the directions of the judge to the jury should be given in writing in one State it should be the same in all. In my own State our local judges give their instructions in writing, and must do so. Our United States judges do not do so. If, therefore, we desire the United States courts to come under the rules that prevail in my State, let us so provide and let the rule be uniform, for otherwise we adopt a rule that subjects the United States judges in this respect to local jurisdiction.

Mr. KNOTT. I would ask the gentleman one question. Would not the bar in his own State be satisfied to have the judges of the United States courts instruct the juries in writing precisely as their State judges are required to do?

Mr. KASSON. I cannot speak for the bar of my State. I can only say that I never heard an expression of discontent in the bar of my State with the habit of the judges of the United States court, which is, to give oral instructions, and I know that that practice has in many cases been found useful by giving more latitude in the consideration of the case.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I suppose that the gentleman from Iowa knows very well that by an act of Congress, I think in 1871, incorporated into the Revised Statutes, the practice and pleadings adopted in the State courts are adopted in the courts of the United States.

Mr. KASSON. There was a special reason for that; but that does not embrace the mode of giving instructions by the court.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Why not?

Mr. KASSON. It does not, in point of fact.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to say that I wish the system which prevails in Iowa, requiring the instructions of the judge to the jury to be in writing, might also be extended to the State of New York, where we have no such practice, either in civil or criminal cases. In our State a trial often degenerates into a trial by judges, instead of one by juries. I have no fear on the subject of this bill affecting the States where instructions are now given in writing, and can only say that I wish the same rule existed in the State of New York.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. As already stated by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] there is now upon the statute-books this provision, section 919 of the Revised Statutes:

> The practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding in civil causes, other than equity and admiralty causes, in the circuit and district courts shall conform, as near as may be, to the practice, pleadings, and forms and modes of proceeding existing at the time in like causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, any rule of court to the contrary notwithstanding.

The evident object of this provision is to assimilate the practice in the United States, circuit, and district courts, to the practice prevailing in the State courts of the State within which United States courts are held. It is maintained by many lawyers that the statute just quoted is sufficiently explicit to require the United States courts to conform their practice in the matter of instructing juries, and the manner of conducting arguments before juries to the existing practice of the State courts. But in some of the States, for some reason or other, the judges of the Federal courts adopt a different rule.

The object of the bill now before the House is simply to make explicit and to put beyond all possibility of controversy or dispute the meaning of the existing statute of the United States on the subject. As is known to the House, the United States circuit and district courts are established in all the States. The jurisdiction of these courts has been extended, until now they have absorbed to a large extent much of the practice and business of the States. As these judges, the district judges especially, and in many cases the circuit judges, are taken from the States where the courts are established, and are familiar with the rules of practice prevailing in the State courts, it is no inconvenience or interference with the judges to require them to instruct the juries in the same way as is provided in the State courts. It will be a great convenience to the attorneys who practice in these courts that the manner of charging juries should be the same as in the State courts, because they are already familiar with that practice. The juries of the State are familiar with that mode of conducting business, and I cannot see what possible objection there can be to requiring the district and circuit judges of the United States to conform their practice in this respect to that of the State courts. It makes the law explicit, so that both attorneys and jurors can understand it.

If the policy is to be persisted in of not only erecting the Federal courts in the States, and extending their jurisdiction to almost every cause local to the States, I can see no reason why the mode of procedure in those courts should not be made to conform as nearly as possible to those of the respective States. That evidently was the purpose of the statute just read, and the bill under consideration will simply carry out the object.

Let the bill become a law.

Mr. KNOTT. I now call the previous question.

Mr. STEELE. I would like the gentleman from Kentucky to allow me to move an amendment to this bill, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. KNOTT. I will hear the amendment read.

Mr. STEELE. My amendment is simply to make this bill, if it becomes a law, apply to the Territories when the district courts of the Territories are exercising the jurisdiction of district and circuit courts of the United States. I propose to amend by inserting after the word "States" the following:

And to the district courts of the several Territories when exercising jurisdiction as district and circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. KNOTT. I must decline to yield for any amendment.

Mr. STEELE. I would like to have a vote on my amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. The purpose of the gentleman can be reached in a separate bill. I must insist upon the previous question.

Mr. COX. I call for the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE.

Mr. ATKINS. Before the House proceeds to the consideration of other business, I desire to report back from the Committee on Appropriations House bill No. 664, making an appropriation for the purchase of additional grounds for the custom-house at Nashville, Tennessee, and to move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

COMMITTEE ON POST-OFFICE AND POST-ROADS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads deem it necessary, in order to properly dispatch the business now before them, to ask permission of the House for that committee to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

TERM OF PRESIDENTIAL OFFICE.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour having expired, the House now resumes the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution, upon which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes, at the expiration of which time the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] will be entitled to the floor to call the previous question upon the resolution and pending amendments.

Mr. WOODWORTH. Mr. Speaker, when I yielded last evening to a motion to adjourn I did so with the generous and unanimous consent of the House that I should be allowed twenty minutes to-day after the morning hour had expired, and before the order with reference to this resolution had become operative, in which to proceed with my remarks. This time will, I think, be sufficient for my purpose if I shall be permitted to proceed without interruption.

I said yesterday that my object in taking the floor was to reply to some suggestions that had been advanced by gentlemen in support of the pending propositions, and to add a word or two to what had been already so well and eloquently said by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] with regard to the third-term idea that had led his committee to report these resolutions.

Sir, I am opposed both to the proposition of the majority and to the proposition of the minority of your Committee on the Judiciary. I do not believe that there ought to be any change in the Constitution limiting the eligibility of a President to one term of any number of years. I have more confidence in the work of the men of 1787 than I have in the wisdom of those who now, some of them for partisan ends as I believe, assume to be terribly frightened at the awful possibilities that may arise out of the blunders of the fathers who thought it wrong to give to the nation the principle of democracy with a shackle upon it, as is proposed by these resolutions.

It was urged yesterday by the gentlemen who advocated a constitutional limitation of presidential eligibility that the proposed inhibition would prevent a diversion of the power and patronage of the President from their legitimate uses to the furtherance of personal ambitions—would tend to secure a statesman instead of a politician in the executive office—would render more remote the possibility of the occurrence here of scenes similar to those which France witnessed in 1852 when the chair of a president, touched by the magic of human ambition, became the throne of a king, and when the short-lived republic of France proved to be but the chrysalis from which burst the empire of the second Napoleon. These, sir, were in substance the arguments, although this was not the manner of presenting them, used yesterday by gentlemen who addressed the House in behalf of the passage of either one or the other of the two resolutions now under consideration.

Sir, the reply final and conclusive to all these is the argument for the Constitution as it is—the argument that prevailed in the minds of the men of 1787, to whose prescience the experience of later years, to which allusion was made, could add nothing. The sovereignty of the people, absolute and supreme, to choose their rulers as they please, limited only by prescribed and highly essential qualifications as to age and citizenship, and in case of the President to nativity also, is the corner-stone upon which our fabric was built. That this sovereignty of the people might not be abridged, that the theory of a government by the people might be realized in its widest scope and broadest sense, the fathers refused to put into the Constitution that which is proposed by these resolutions. As was said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW,] this question was prominent in the serious debates of the convention of 1787. Alexander Hamilton believed that the President should hold a life office, while Benjamin Franklin thought that at decent periods he should be returned to the people, which he considered no degradation but a promotion, as it was a change from the condition of servant to that of master. John Randolph and others advocated a limit to one term, while Roger Sherman and many other equally prominent members of the convention opposed such a limitation. In this debate it is useful to note that the idea of re-eligibility found its strongest support when coupled with the proposal that the President should be elected by the national Legislature, and that the argument for it was based upon the supposition that this would secure the executive office against the danger of too great an influence from the legislative branch. When, however, it was determined that the President should be elected by the people through an electoral college, (which in passing let me say I cannot but regard as an unfortunate concession to an anti-democratic idea,) this body of wise and patriotic men refused to place this limit upon the free choice of the people. The reason for this refusal, namely, a more unlimited democracy, is as good to-day as it was eighty-nine years ago. This, sir, is worthy to be remembered by the House, if it becomes us to be heedful of the light which streams down upon us through more than three-quarters of a century from the lamps which guided the fathers when they made successful search beneath the gloomy absurdities piled up by a thousand years of despotisms for the grand truth of human governments upon which to build a new nation.

By the Declaration of Independence, so much in all our minds in this centennial year, and so much in all our utterances, too, I might add; by the achievements, both in Congress, where the experiment of self-government was fashioned in the anxious minds of men, and upon the field where armies "threw the iron death-dice" for human rights; by the convention of 1787, mentioned a moment ago, where all the experiences of the past and all the possibilities of the future were brought together and made to join hands to work out the problem, the mighty problem, of how may this thing known as the rights of the people, so long hidden beneath the bald absurdity of the divine right of kings, be most surely realized—by these, sir, was our nation planted upon the foundation-rock of self-government by the people; and this foundation-rock has become to be to us a political "rock of ages" upon which let no man or body of men lay desecrating hands. Upon this foundation-rock our governmental superstructure rests—a superstructure so magnificent and grand that in this hundredth year we exult that it is ours, realizing that it is the acme toward which struggled the nobler ambitions of the past, and that within it now the century-aloe of human hope is blossoming, filling the earth with incense. Its base is the divinity of human rights. Its area is the breadth of a gigantic continent. Its bulwark is forty millions of undaunted hearts. Its dome is crowned with the achievements of a hundred years. Thus, sir, it stands to-day, the boast of Americans, the wonder of mankind. It is the temple of refuge for the oppressed of every clime, and is ere long to become the model upon which the artists and the artisans of Old World politics shall fashion a hundred emulating structures in a hundred lands. The beneficence of its example must be felt. This year, thanks to the patriotic city of Philadelphia, thanks to the grand Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, thanks to the country-loving men and women of the whole Union who have stretched a hand to aid our proposed centennial jubilee, and thanks, too, to the action of this House taken but a few days ago—this year there shall go out from it, as well from where the Golden Gate stands open to the lisping southern sea as from where old Plymouth Rock still beats back the angry Atlantic, a voice saying to the nations of the East and to the nations of the West, Come up higher! and that voice shall be echoed and re-echoed over the craggy continent and sea-girt isles of Europe and wafted even into the slumberous haze of "farthest Ind," until one day the response, We come! shall float back, and the divinity of human rights, overthrown ten centuries ago by Charlemagne and the conspiring prelates of that era, shall be reproclaimed on the ruined walls of many a dynasty and planted a star, high up in heaven, there forever to remain a political guide-star for human kind.

Do gentlemen smile at this as the perhaps pardonable rhetoric of this our centennial year? I indulge, sir, in no mere figures of extravagant speech. This is but a portrayal, a faint portrayal, of that which is in the hearts of all our people—of the people of the North and of the South, of the East and of the West, as they now step out from the war-begrimed, victory-garlanded, peace-decorated corridors of the past into the full radiance of this centennial era, and bow their heads to receive the parting benediction of the grandest hundred years of human history, and turn their faces to listen to golden promise for the still grander centuries that are to come.

Now, sir, it is proposed upon this second day of the second month of our centennial year—proposed in the American Congress, the lineal successor to that body which a hundred years ago proclaimed to mankind the doctrine of human rights; proposed, forgetful of that which has led us up into the mountain-top where we now stand—proposed that we shall begin the new century with a backward step, and let its gray dawn reveal us working like undermining rats around the base of this grand, magnificent superstructure, to lessen its strength by placing a shackle upon the complete sovereignty of the people. Sir, I doubt if gentlemen appreciate that this is a proposition to abridge, to curtail, to circumscribe our democracy. I am amazed that any should wish thus to begin the new century. Such a wish stands in sad contrast to the lofty aspirations that fired the hearts of the men who were upon the stage at the beginning of the century just gone, the echoes of whose retiring foot-fall still linger in the corridors of yesterday.

Should this proposition succeed, the men of a hundred years hence will have less cause to be jubilant than do the men of to-day, for one step in the wrong direction renders another so easy, and the momentum of evil when once in motion is so irresistible, that none could then tell if the light which shall burst up from the East in a hundred years will throw its sheen upon that structure that towers up from our land to-day overlooking the nations. Depend upon it that, upon this subject at any rate, the fathers were wiser than your Judiciary Committee, and that in this respect at least you can make the Constitution no better than they left it to us.

If the progress of years has developed that a change in our fundamental law is necessary to secure or to carry out a principle of the fathers, I for one shall not be heard to object; nay, I shall be among the first, in my humble way, to aid in securing such a change. But, sir, this is not an amendment to carry out but to destroy a principle of the fathers by limiting the prerogative of the people. Are not the people to be trusted? That they are not is the inference of this proposition. This antagonizes the views of the fathers. There is no idea in these resolutions, nor is there anything that can be urged in their support, that is not incompatible with the spirit that gave birth and being to the Republic a hundred years ago.

To the argument that this amendment would tend to give more statesmanship and less political management in the executive office, I reply that it is of the very essence of republicanism, it is of the highest importance to democracy that the executive office should ever be as responsive to the will of the people as is the barometer to the indications of the atmosphere. Our democracy else would be at best but a limited democracy. It may be true, as is sometimes said, that the people in the act of an election delegate for a period a portion of the sovereignty that is theirs, but it is not true that for this period their sovereignty is wholly lost, and that they relapse into the condition of subjects. No; by the powers which are reserved in their hands to remove through other officers, and by the very genius of our institutions, all officers of the Government are but the agents of the people to carry out their will by the performance of acts which they are too numerous to do themselves as in a pure democracy. The sovereignty always resides with the people, and public officers are only the agents to enact or execute it. Hence, to follow the declared will of the people, keeping always within the Constitution, is the duty of every officer in a government like ours, and whatsoever will tend to make such an officer less responsive to the popular will tends to autocracy, and must be subversive in a greater or less degree of the idea that the people govern. Yet this is precisely what these resolutions propose, and this is the argument used by gentlemen to support them.

But this is not all. Often it may occur in times of great business calamity or of social upheaval, like the war of the rebellion, that it would be disastrous to change an executive. New men mean new measures. A change signifies that the value of experience shall be thrown away. There was much homely wisdom in what Mr. Lincoln is reported to have said in 1864, that "it is dangerous to swap horses while crossing a stream." The reason of this truth when applied to the Presidency is apparent. Suppose, sir, that this proposed amendment had been a part of the Constitution in 1864. We scarcely dare to contemplate what might have been the result. Yet similar circumstances may environ us again, though God in His infinite mercy grant that it may be otherwise. At any rate, let us not put it into the Constitution that we must commit national suicide should such an event again transpire.

The dangers of which gentlemen have spoken as possible under the Constitution as it is are, in my judgment, wholly improbable, nay, absolutely impossible. Why, sir, the people are the masters here, and propose to remain so. Are they, with their intelligence and might and with every means to prevent within their reach, to submit to a perversion of the Government? Such things can only be suffered by a more ignorant and a less fortunate people than ours. Our country, sir, will never need a Brutus, for our people will never permit a Cæsar. But suppose that there is some tinge of reality to the dangers which gentlemen apprehend. Is it not true that, by immemorial practice, by the usages of nearly a hundred years, the precedent of no more than two terms in the presidential office for one citizen has been established; and is not this a sufficient safeguard? As I said a moment since, it may occur again as in 1864 that the election of a President to a second or even to a third term may be necessary to the existence of the nation. I can conceive this as entirely possible. To provide for such an emergency let us tie ourselves down by no constitutional amendment, but let us rather trust to the precedents of the past and to the good sense of the people to take care of their liberties. Have no fear that they will not do it. They will by "eternal vigilance" take care of their liberties and show that the picture which Franklin contemplated upon the last day of the convention of 1787, as emblematic of the work just accomplished, was a picture of the rising and not of the setting sun.

Now, sir, a word or two more with regard to the idea that has led up to this proposition and I shall then have said my say.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PAGE. I ask that by unanimous consent the gentleman have five minutes more to complete his remarks.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. WOODWORTH. I am very much obliged to the House for its courtesy.

The charges of improper ambition on the part of our present worthy Chief Executive and the innuendoes of machinations on his part to secure the presidential chair for a third term, made not so much in the course of this debate as frequently in this House since the session began and throughout the country during a series of years by those opposed to the political party which elected him, have led up to the presentation, in serious, sober, downright earnest, of these most dangerous propositions. Sir, I cannot but regard all such charges and innuendoes as these as the highest injustice to a worthy, an unambitious, and a patriotic President; a President whose administrative acts, when they shall have been taken out from the murk of partisan censure and the spume of personal animosities and ambitions and placed truthfully upon the pages of American history, will shine with a luster undimmed by any hint of ambition; will glitter and glow upon those pages as administrations which, although surrounded by peculiar difficulties, nevertheless gave to the country results of peculiar patriotism, justice, and purity. As men of all political parties today turn with pride to the memory of him whose venerated ashes now sleep in the shades of the Hermitage and quote the immortal utterance, "By the Eternal, the Union must and shall be preserved," so I believe that in the near future men of all political creeds will point with pride to the two administrations of President Grant and repeat the sententious utterances, "I will fight it out on this line if it takes all summer," "Let us have peace," "Let no guilty man escape."

Sir, I voted the other day upon the motion of some one of the numerous Warwicks upon the other side of the House, and I have at this moment forgotten whom, so immortal and immortalizing was the act, for a resolution declaring against a third term. I did so because I do not think that the exigency is upon us which would justify a departure from the time-honored practices of the past. But I here and now most solemnly declare that I believe that it would be better, far better, for the people of our country, better for every interest that is sacred to the American heart, that President Grant should be elected to a third term than that the chair which he now fills with such honor to the Republic should be occupied by a man who because of party obligation must incline his ear to the counsels of those who only twelve years ago stood with arms in their hands seeking to destroy this grand Government which our fathers gave to us, and who by their own confession are only back in the Union again not from choice but because they could not help themselves. Sir, it is not in my mind to stir up the fast-dying embers of fought-out battles. We are glad to welcome them back to the common hearth-stone. In the beginning of this new century we are ready to grasp them by the hand, and with them look forward into the future toward our common destiny as a people. To the spirit of conciliation we will surrender everything but the safety of that common future. "With malice toward none, with charity for all," we will go forward, but in our memories there must abide just enough of the sorrowful past for an assurance most absolute that its darker part will recur no more forever.

Sir, I do not approve of all the acts of President Grant, or agree with some of his ideas touching certain economic questions, regarding which there is the widest diversity of opinion among men of all political parties. The leading acts of his administrations, however, I believe to have been founded and executed in wisdom, and I know that they are indorsed by the great national party which elected him.

Upon what pretense of foundation are these charges made? Sir, I challenge any gentleman upon this floor or in the whole country to point to a single act or utterance of President Grant which would indicate that he is animated by any ambition save always the honorable ambition to faithfully execute the laws, to stand steadfast by the Constitution of the country and the rights and liberties of the people. That he is moved by other ambitions than these is but the wild chimera of dreaming political antagonists, fitting perhaps for the demagogue, but certainly unworthy an influence in this Hall. It is, sir, however, according to the eternal fitness of things that such a proposition as the one before us should be born of such a chimera. I trust that we shall be led no further in this direction by the mirage which appears only to the distempered visions of scheming politicians, and that these resolutions, each as it shall come up in its order, will be promptly voted down.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio does not ask any extension of time.

Mr. KNOTT. I call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. YOUNG. Mr. Speaker, before the previous question is called I desire to relieve the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WOODWORTH,] who has just spoken, of the apprehension which seems to trouble him that some one who bore arms against the Federal Government in the late civil war may by some chance be elected President of the United States when the term of the present incumbent shall expire. As one of the representatives of that class whose presence in this House excites the alarm of the gentleman from Ohio and his party friends, I take the responsibility of saying that there are no candidates for the Presidency among those to whom he refers. They are entirely willing to intrust for the present their own fortunes and the government of the country in the hands of the honest and true men of the nation who stood by the Union during the war and now support the Constitution when it is over and peace prevails throughout the land. The gentleman may dismiss his fears.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. Mr. Speaker, if I did not think it probable that I would be expected to say something in support of the proposition reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, I do not know that I would feel disposed to add a single remark to what has already been said upon the question under discussion; for I presume, sir, that there is scarcely an intelligent mind either in this House or out of it which has not already reached a conclusion upon the subject under consideration which no argument of mine would be likely to alter or confirm.

The opinion that there should be some limit to eligibility to the chief executive office of the Government is by no means a new one in American politics. If gentlemen will turn to the Articles of Confederation they will find that by the fifth article the delegates in Congress to whom were intrusted the executive as well as the legislative functions of government were rendered ineligible for three years in every six. Moreover, if they will take the trouble to examine the proceedings of the convention which framed our present Constitution, they will find that this idea, this mistrust of executive power, not only antedated the existence of that instrument, but that no question was more frequently or earnestly discussed by the illustrious men who composed that convention, nor one upon which there was a more remarkable concurrence of opinion than upon the very proposition now under consideration, that the Chief Executive of the Government should be ineligible to that distinguished position after a single term. Indeed, the very first business proposed to that body was the famous series of fifteen resolutions submitted by Mr. Randolph, of Virginia, the seventh of which was as follows:

Resolved, That a national executive be instituted, to be chosen by the national Legislature for the term of —— years, * * * to be ineligible a second time, &c.

This resolution having been earnestly discussed and maturely considered, the question was taken upon agreeing to the clause "to be ineligible a second time," and it was carried in the affirmative by a vote of almost unprecedented unanimity, only one State voting against it, while the delegation from another was divided. The vote was as follows: Yeas—Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—8. Nay—Connecticut—1. Divided—Pennsylvania. Having been thus determined in the convention, it was referred, along with a variety of other matters, to the committee of five appointed to prepare a draught for a constitution, and was afterward reported back to the convention in article 10 of the plan submitted by them, which was as follows:

ARTICLE X.

SECTION 1. The executive power of the United States shall be vested in a single person. His style shall be "The President of the United States of America," and his title shall be "His excellency." He shall be elected by ballot by the Legislature. He shall hold his office for seven years; but shall not be elected a second time.

The question as to the manner in which the President should be elected having given rise to considerable discussion and elicited a variety of conflicting opinions, the section was referred to a committee of eleven, which subsequently reported it back with a plan for electing the President by electors, but, for some reason which has never yet been explained so far as I know, leaving out the clause limiting his eligibility to a single term, notwithstanding it had been previously adopted by the convention by a most emphatic and decisive vote as I have already stated.

It was that very omission, sir, which gave rise to the animadversion of Luther Martin in his celebrated report to the Legislature of Maryland, read by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on yesterday, and the party to whom Luther Martin therein alluded as being desirous of making the tenure of the presidential office for life was Alexander Hamilton, the ardent advocate of a strong executive government, the known and avowed friend of a qualified monarchy, and one whom I must confess I was very much surprised to hear my friend from Indiana quoting as authority against the propriety of limiting the eligibility of the President to a single term.

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman permit me to interrupt him to say that I did not refer to Mr. Hamilton's plan in support of the proposition that I was favoring in my remarks. A reference to my language will show that in connection with Mr. Hamilton's name I was only enumerating the different propositions which were submitted by different delegates upon the subject of the presidential term, and among others gave Mr. Hamilton's plan.

Mr. KNOTT. Nor is this all, sir. When the Constitution was submitted to the several States for their ratification, the convention of Virginia submitted along with its resolution of ratification, among a variety of other propositions, an amendment to render the President ineligible eight years in every sixteen; North Carolina proposed that he should be made ineligible for eight out of fifteen years; and New York insisted that he should be forever ineligible after a single term. In fact, sir, from the time our Constitution was proposed down to the present hour there has never been a time in which the propriety of limiting the eligibility of the President to a single term has not attracted the attention and elicited the earnest approval of many of the most distinguished American statesmen, without regard to their political views in other particulars.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] on yesterday cited the opinion of the great apostle of American democracy, Mr. Jefferson, and as his testimony may perhaps still meet with some consideration on this floor, I beg leave to read an extract from a letter addressed by him to John Adams, dated at Paris, November 13, 1787:

How do you like our new Constitution? I confess there are things in it which stagger all my disposition to subscribe to what such an assembly has proposed. The House of Federal Representatives will not be adequate to the management of affairs either foreign or federal. Their President seems a bad edition of a Polish king. He may be elected from four years to four years for life. Reason and experience prove to us that a chief magistrate so continuable is an officer for life. When one or two generations shall have proved that this is an office for life, it becomes on every occasion worthy of intrigue, of bribery, of force, and even of foreign interference. * * * Once in office and possessing the military force of the Union, without the aid or check of a council, he would not be easily dethroned, even if the people could be induced to withdraw their votes for him. I wish that at the end of four years they had made him forever ineligible a second time.

Again, in a letter addressed to Colonel Smith, he remarks:

There are very good articles in it and very bad. I do not know which preponderate. What we have lately read in the history of Holland, in the chapter on the stadtholder, would have sufficed to set me against a chief magistrate eligible for a long duration if I had ever been disposed toward one; and what we have always read of the elections of Polish kings should have forever excluded the idea of one continuable for life.

Again, sir, in writing to Mr. Thomas Martin, September 20, 1813, he says:

I am for responsibilities at short periods, seeing neither reason nor safety in making public functionaries independent of the nation for life, or even for a long term of years. On this principle I prefer the presidential term of four years to that of seven years, which I myself had at first suggested, annexing to it, however, ineligibility forever after that, and I wish it were now annexed to the second quadrennial election of President.

But, sir, as the very eloquent gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WOODWORTH] who has just taken his seat has invoked the shade of the hero and sage whose ashes sleep in the quiet precincts of the Hermitage, it may not be inappropriate for me to call his attention to the repeated utterances of that great oracle of the democracy upon the very question under discussion.

If he will turn to the first annual message of President Jackson he will find this language:

I would therefore recommend such an amendment of the Constitution as may remove all intermediate agency in the election of President and Vice-President. The mode may be so regulated as to preserve to each State its present relative weight in the election; and a failure in the first attempt may be provided for, by confining the second to a choice between the two highest candidates. In connection with such an amendment, it would seem advisable to limit the service of the Chief Magistrate to a single term of either four or six years. If, however, it should not be adopted, it is worthy of consideration whether a provision disqualifying for office the Representatives in Congress on whom such an election may have devolved would not be proper.

Again in his second annual message he reiterates the suggestion with renewed earnestness.

It was a leading object with the framers of the Constitution to keep as separate as possible the action of the legislative and executive branches of the Government. To secure this object, nothing is more essential than to preserve the former from the temptations of private interest, and, therefore, so to direct the patronage of the latter as not to permit such temptations to be offered. Experience abundantly demonstrates that every precaution in this respect is a valuable safeguard of liberty, and one which, my reflections upon the tendencies of our system incline me to think, should be made still stronger. It was for this reason that, in connection with an amendment of the Constitution removing all intermediate agency in the choice of the President, I recommended some restrictions upon the re-eligibility of that officer, and upon the tenure of officers generally. The reason still exists, and I renew the recommendation with an increased confidence that this adoption will strengthen those checks by which the Constitution designed to secure the independence of each Department of the Government and promote the healthful and equitable administration of all the trusts which it has created. The agent most likely to contravene this design of the Constitution is the Chief Magistrate. In order, particularly, that this appointment may, as far as possible, be placed beyond the reach of any improper influences; in order that he may approach the solemn responsibilities of the highest office in the gift of a free people uncommitted to any other course than the strict line of constitutional duty, and that the securities for this independence may be rendered as strong as the nature of power and the weakness of its possessor will admit, I cannot too earnestly invite your attention to the propriety of promoting such amendment of the Constitution as will render him ineligible after one term of service.

In his third annual message he says:

I have heretofore recommended amendments to the Federal Constitution giving the election of President and Vice-President to the people and limiting the service of the former to a single term. So important do I consider these changes in our fundamental law that I cannot, in accordance with my sense of duty, omit to impress them upon the consideration of a new Congress.

Again, sir, in his fifth annual message, after he had himself been elected a second time, he most earnestly invited the attention of Congress to the various suggestions he had made as to the propriety and necessity of amending the Constitution so as to limit the eligibility of the President to a single term, which, it will be observed, he says he considers "as all-important to the future quiet and harmony of the American people." He says:

I would also call your attention to the views I have heretofore expressed of the propriety of amending the Constitution in relation to the mode of electing the President and Vice-President of the United States. Regarding it as all-important to the future quiet and harmony of the people that every intermediate agency in the election of these officers should be removed and their eligibility should be limited to one term of either four or six years, I cannot too earnestly invite your consideration to the subject.

But, sir, this is not all. Who is there here who has forgotten one of the most remarkable political contests that ever occurred upon the American continent—the memorable canvass of 1844? Who has forgotten the battle-cry of the great whig party, which rang out from one end of the country to the other, "A single term for the President?" One term for the President was the watch-word at the Harrisburgh convention which nominated General Harrison in 1839, whose very first utterance upon his inauguration was to echo the sentiment of his party, and to declare his own unalterable determination never to contravene it by becoming a candidate a second time.

In his inaugural address he said:

It may be observed, however, as a general remark, that republics can commit no greater error than to adopt or continue any feature in their systems of government which may be calculated to create or increase the love of power in the bosoms of those to whom necessity obliges them to commit the management of their affairs. And surely nothing is more likely to produce such a state of mind than the long continuance of an office of high trust. Nothing can be more corrupting, nothing more destructive of all those noble feelings which belong to the character of a devoted republican patriot. When this corrupting passion once takes possession of the human mind, like the love of gold, it becomes insatiable. It is the never-dying worm on his bosom, grows with his growth, and strengthens with the declining years of his victim. If this is true, it is the part of wisdom for a republic to limit the service of that officer at least to whom she has intrusted the management of her foreign relations, the execution of her laws, and the command of her armies and navies to a period so short as to prevent his forgetting that he is the accountable agent, not the principal; the servant, not the master. Until an amendment of the Constitution can be effected, public opinion may secure the desired object. I give my aid to it by renewing the pledge heretofore given, that under no circumstances will I consent to serve a second time.

But, sir, I need not weary the House by groping amid the records of the past for arguments in support of the proposition to limit the eligibility of the President to a single term, or for suggestions showing the necessity and importance of some such measure. I spoke yesterday of the singular unanimity of sentiment which I believed to exist all over the country upon this point, and it would seem that the distinguished gentlemen who represent the other side of the House with such signal ability upon the Committee on the Judiciary are themselves convinced of the propriety of fixing some limit to the eligibility of the President, for certainly they would not have reported back their proposition limiting it to six years unless they thought some such limitation necessary and proper. And, sir, there is another quite recent and somewhat remarkable event which suggests in the very strongest possible light the propriety of some such measure as this. On the 15th day of December, in the year of grace 1875, just before the early dawn of "this our centennial year," two hundred and thirty-two gentlemen, selected from among their fellow-citizens on account of their superior virtue, intelligence, and patriotism no doubt, in full view of the solemnity of the obligation they had but recently, with uplifted hands, taken upon themselves, deliberately declared—

That in the opinion of this House the precedent established by Washington and other Presidents of the United States in retiring from the presidential office after their second term has become by universal concurrence a part of our republican system of government, and that any departure from this time-honored custom would be unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions."

[Laughter.]

It is true there were eighteen heroic gentlemen who showed by their votes that they were not a particle more terrified than the Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States was on that memorable occasion when his person was exposed to the perils of the banditti of New Orleans. They were not afraid. [Laughter.] But, sir, when two hundred and thirty-two gentlemen on this floor solemnly declared that the continuance of a President in office for more than eight years would be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions," I presume they meant what they said, and that they would do what they could to remove that peril as far as possible by fixing some constitutional limit to the eligibility of the President. That they would fix the bounds and say to him, "Thus far shalt thou go but no farther."

The one all-sufficient reason for limiting eligibility to the presidential office to a single term is stated either directly or inferentially in every one of the utterances to which I have called attention. It is to be found, sir, in the natural and almost inevitable inclination of one in possession of an honorable and lucrative office to retain possession of it, and in the equally natural and probable disposition on his part under such a temptation to make use of the tremendous appliances under his control to perpetuate his power. It has been many and many a time remarked that an incumbent of a good fat office seldom dies, and never resigns; and, sir, it is true. There is scarcely anything else within the entire range of human affection which under some circumstances may not be surrendered with cheerfulness. Friends, home, country, and even life itself may be given up without a murmur; but the disinterested patriot once in possession of a good paying public office hangs on to it with a grim determination and a deathless constancy that would have added a brighter halo to the crown of a Christian martyr, [laughter,] especially when his salary is $50,000 a year; when he is supplied with a palace maintained in a style of luxury of which Lucullus himself never dreamed, furnished, repaired, and heated at an annual expense of $25,000; where the very air he breathes is redolent with the perfume of rare exotics propagated in a fifty-five-thousand-dollar greenhouse, maintained out of the public Treasury at an expense of $5,000 per annum, [laughter;] an office in which he has his writing done by a private secretary on a salary of $3,500 a year, with an assistant secretary on a salary of $2,500 to do the writing of the private secretary, [laughter,] and two clerks at $4,500 to do the writing of the assistant secretary, [renewed laughter;] where he has a steward at $2,000 per annum to purvey for his table the choicest wines and the daintiest viands that can either tempt or satiate the appetite, and where he is allowed $6,000 a year for books, papers, periodicals, telegrams, and "general contingencies." What general contingencies may include I do not know, but let us thank God for the contingencies anyhow. [Laughter.] Why, Mr. Speaker, if the children of Israel sighed for the "flesh-pots," the leeks and onions and garlic and other beggarly concomitants of their bondage in Egypt, what must be the emotions of a sensitive and patriotic soul on contemplating a last, long farewell to a salary and perquisites like these? [Laughter.] Now, sir, I ask gentlemen who would lengthen the present term of the presidential office to go home to their honest-hearted, hard-working, over-taxed constituents and explain to them if they can why it is that four years are not a sufficient length of time for any one American citizen to enjoy the luxuries I have mentioned.

Ah! but say gentlemen on the other side, we want the benefit of the President's experience after a four-years term for another term of similiar duration; that of all the offices in the gift of the American people there is no other in which experience is so necessary as in the office of President; that the greater experience the incumbent may have had as President the better President he will make. But if this is true, by what process of reasoning can they justify their votes upon the anti-third-term resolution? Will not General Grant at the end of his eight years, with all his experience, be a far better President than he was when you first elected him? Then why say that it would be "unwise, unpatriotic, and fraught with peril to our free institutions" to continue him in office when we stand so much in need of his vast experience?

But I ask gentlemen to point out a solitary instance in which the last year of the administration of any President has been more satisfactory to the people than the first.

Mr. GARFIELD. Would you apply that remark to the second term of General Jackson?

Mr. KNOTT. Does the gentleman mean to say that General Jackson was any better President the last year of his administration than he was the first year? That is the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that I think General Jackson's second term was much more illustrious than his first, and that the country recalls far more gratefully the things he achieved in his second term than those he accomplished in his first. I am not now discussing the general results of the gentleman's argument, but only the historical point that he has incidentally touched upon.

Mr. KNOTT. But, sir, if the argument is sound that a man who has had no experience as President is not qualified for the office, we had better establish a school for the especial purpose of training presidential aspirants at once. [Laughter.] We had better set up some such institution as the one we have at West Point to supply our Army with commanders, which has now, as I am informed, only one commissioned officer to every eleven men. I am corrected, sir, by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who tells me we have only one commissioned officer for every six men. [Laughter.]

But where, sir, let me ask, did all the illustrious statesmen who have filled the presidential chair acquire their experience as Presidents before they were elected? Where did the hero of New Orleans receive his training, and in what school did our present gifted Executive learn the art and mystery of presiding over the destinies of forty millions of people? Sir, gentlemen will pardon me, I hope, if I suggest that such an argument seems to me to be somewhat specious.

Moreover, sir, it has been urged with a great deal of zeal and earnestness by gentlemen on the other side, and especially by the very eloquent gentleman who was last up, that the time may come when the very necessities of the case will imperatively demand that we should re-elect a President a second or even a third time; but I deny that there ever was or ever will be such a condition of our people or our public affairs that only one man can be found out of the millions of our citizens, only one man capable of discharging the duties of the presidency. If such a time should ever arrive, then, sir, the American people will be unfit for freemen, utterly unworthy of their liberties. I know it has been sometimes suggested that such an overshadowing necessity has really existed, but I will venture the assertion that if the truth could be ascertained such suggestions have invariably had their origin in the brain of the incumbent of the office. It was considered absolutely necessary that Marius should be elected to the consulate a second time in violation of the Roman constitution because of the threatening approach of the Cimbri, and he continued to be elected for five successive times; and I have no doubt in the world that when the chairman of the convention notified him that he had been nominated for the third term, he wrote to him that he "did not desire the nomination then any more than he did the first time." [Laughter.] Nevertheless he took it.

Again, sir, it is argued on the other side that this measure indicates a distrust of either the virtue or the intelligence of the people—that it is to limit the choice of the people. But nothing could possibly be further from either its intendment or its effect. It is designed solely for the protection of the people from the encroachments of executive ambition and power. I admit that if the people primarily determined the question as to who should be their President, it would go far toward answering a great many objections to the unlimited re-eligibility to that office which now exists; but we all know that such is not the case, or at least only to a very limited extent. We know that the presidential candidate is the creature of the convention, which is itself the creature of State conventions, which in their turn are the offspring of county caucuses, in which the great mass of the people have but little, if any, participation whatever.

Under such circumstances it is not at all difficult to see how the forebodings of Mr. Jefferson may be realized, that a President may be elected from four years to four years during life if he should be disposed to make use of the appliances at his command. Sir, if Mr. Jefferson, who saw from afar the dangers lurking in the re-eligibility of the President, if he could realize those dangers as vividly as he seems to have done under the circumstances by which he was surrounded, with what emotions of alarm would he contemplate the condition of things as it now exists!

Last year there was wrung mainly from the labor of this country—and that, too, through the instrumentality of an indirect, insidious, and cunningly devised system of taxation which holds the anesthetic to the nose of the tax-payer while pillaging his pockets of his hard earnings—the enormous sum of $284,020,770, which was collected and disbursed mainly through the agency of, and in a great part to, a vast army of office-holders, almost as innumerable as the swarms of frogs which infested Egypt in the days of Pharaoh; every one of whom is dependent either directly or indirectly upon the presidential fiat for the breath of his official existence. There is the Secretary of State, at the head of his division of ministers, and consuls-general, and consuls, and consular agents, and clerks; and there is the Secretary of the Treasury, with his vast retinue of subordinates, his commissioners, deputy commissioners, supervisors, and collectors, and deputy collectors, his comptrollers, and his auditors, his surveyors, and assessors, and so on, from the assistant secretary down to the still-house watchman; and there is the Secretary of the Interior, with his commissioners, his pension agents, his Indian agents, and so on; and there is the Attorney-General, with his district attorneys, his marshals, and his deputy marshals; and there is the Postmaster-General, with his thirty-five thousand postmasters, besides his special agents, and his general agents, and his route-agents, permeating the country everywhere and in every city, town, village, and neighborhood throughout the land; and there is the Secretary of the Navy, with his hosts of employés in every navy-yard upon our coasts. Yes, sir; there they all are, subject to the organization and drill of a thoroughly disciplined Army. Does it need any argument to prove that a President disposed to use such tremendous appliances for the perpetuation of his own power, and capable of doing so with skill, could not if he chose be President for life? Do you tell me there is no danger of such an organization being used for political purposes? Why, sir, I would ask if the salary of a solitary one of this vast army of office-holders, even down to the "sair won penny fee" of the Department clerk, escaped assessment for political purposes during the last canvass, or will escape assessment for the one to come?

But, sir, if the shade of Jefferson would be alarmed by this parade of officials, all dependent upon the will and power of the President, how much greater would be his consternation to find the expenditures of the Government—I mean the net ordinary expenditures—for the last six years over 2,000 per cent. greater than for the whole eight years of his own administration? Yet such is the fact. What would General Jackson say, think you, if he could come back to earth and find, upon looking over the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that, while the net ordinary expenditures of the Government during the whole eight years of his administration amounted to only $122,543,941, the same character of expenditures during the last six years have reached the incalculable sum of $1,021,344,659; and that, in the most economical of all the years of the present Administration, the net ordinary expenditures of the Government were $30,617,000 more than during the entire eight years of his own administration?

Sir, I call attention to these facts not only to illustrate the enormous power of money as well as of numbers now wielded by a single hand of this Government, but to furnish another answer to the objection which gentlemen have urged against the report of the majority of the committee that four years is too short a time for one man to occupy the presidential chair. I do it in order to show the extreme importance of calling every officer, even the President, to as frequent and as speedy an accountability as possible to their masters, the people; the propriety of having a frequent and a thorough overhauling of the books. And besides, sir, it may be possible—I do not say that it ever has happened or that it will happen—yet it may be possible that at some time or other we may be so unfortunate as to elect a bad man to the Presidency, of whom we would wish to be rid as soon as consistent with public convenience; consequently the shorter the term the better in that regard.

There is one other objection urged by the other side against the report of the committee which I desire to notice very briefly and then I will be done, and that is that, if the resolution shall be adopted as reported, it will render ineligible any Vice-President upon whom the office of President may devolve, even though it should be but for a single day. That is precisely what the proposed amendment is designed to do, and exactly what will be its effect if adopted, and it is precisely as I would have it. The arguments of gentlemen on the other side seem to proceed entirely upon the hypothesis that this Government was not made for the benefit of the people at all, but merely for the purpose of affording an opportunity for gratifying the ambition of a few aspiring men. All the answer I desire to make to this objection, therefore, is simply to say that the occupancy for four years of the next highest office in the gift of the American people, with its salary and perquisites, especially when he has reached the very summit, and has enjoyed the very highest honor that can be bestowed under our Government, ought to be enough to satisfy any one citizen, and there will be no difficulty in finding an abundance of able and patriotic gentlemen who will be glad to accept the Vice-Presidency even on these terms. At any rate I feel persuaded that a large majority of the distinguished gentlemen on this floor would be satisfied to have it even under the amendment as proposed by the committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was about to say that I regret that I have not at command any of those beautiful and eloquent platitudes with which we are so frequently regaled on this floor with which to round off my remarks in a sublime peroration; but, on reconsideration, I believe I do not regret it. I am simply a plain, blunt man, who speaks right on the things I do know. And even if I had the marvelous eloquence of some of the gentlemen around me I would hesitate to use it, especially on this occasion.

This is of all questions the one upon which every gentleman ought to bring to bear a cool, calm, deliberate judgment, as I am persuaded every one will. Personally I have no interest whatever more than any other citizen of the country as to the fate of this measure. I present it as the organ of the committee of which I am a member, and I present it as the result of my own deliberate, carefully matured judgment, leaving every other gentleman to act upon it as he may think proper.

I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. The gentleman from Kentucky, the chairman of the committee who made this report, has truly said that until the committee of eleven in the Federal Convention on September 4, 1787, reported a four-year term, the old convention in framing the Constitution had voted some six or seven times for a clause providing that the occupant of the presidential chair should be ineligible to re-election. The gentleman from Kentucky has not said that in every one of those votes the term voted for and adopted was a longer term than four years.

I believe the question was introduced into that convention on the 1st of June, 1787, when the term proposed was a seven-years term, on which proposition and ineligibility for re-election the States of New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, New Jersey, and Virginia, five States, voted for it; Connecticut, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia against it; Massachusetts divided. Upon the next day they again voted on the same proposition, a seven-years term with ineligibility. At that time the vote stood: Massachusetts, New York, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, seven, for it; and against it, Connecticut and Georgia; Pennsylvania divided. Again, there was a motion made on the 17th of July to give the occupant of the presidential chair a term during good behavior. This received only two votes. And all through the sittings of the convention, until the committee of eleven reported, there was a number of votes on a seven-years term and ineligibility to re-election. There was one proposition for a term of six years, which was adopted with but two dissentient votes. This proposition also provided ineligibility for re-election.

The committee of eleven reported, as I have said, on September 4 in favor of a term of four years, but the report was silent on the question of re-eligibility. When the proposition was submitted to the several States, as the gentleman stated, the State of Virginia demurred, as other States did, an amendment providing ineligibility. But the Constitution was submitted to those States as a whole. There was no opportunity for those States to demand a division of the question; and this proposition was involved in the proposition whether we should have a Federal Government. It cannot therefore be inferred, because the Constitution as a whole was adopted, that this feature of it met with the approval of the people or States at that time.

We have, therefore, the judgment rendered in some seven votes of that convention for a seven-years term, and one vote for a six-years term, the occupant rendered ineligible to re-election in all these cases and this report finally adopted, which was silent on the question of re-eligibility, left the question before us as we find it. The report of the committee of eleven involved many separate propositions which had excited discussion. Nothing indicates why this report was made by the committee. The proposition for four years had never at any time been adopted by the convention, and first appeared in this report, which was submitted as a whole. In all the votes of the convention they had adopted the feature of rendering the President ineligible to re-election. This had been discussed. The report changed the action of the convention in both, and the adoption of that report was doubtless the result of a necessity for compromise. As the gentleman from Kentucky said, it was inexplicable.

I shall favor, and have risen to favor, the proposition of the minority of the committee, made by the gentleman from Maine, for the reasons involved in arguments which have been given, but I differ from the gentleman who offered it in what he stated as the wishes of the people on the subject. I think the public sentiment of the country wishes to be rid of this disturbing question, and settle it definitely by constitutional amendment. The personal question supposed to be involved in it is not really involved in it. There is no personal question involved. It is a simple, plain proposition, and refers to no man. There has been no reason for the assaults or the praise that any man elected to the Presidency has received in this connection. No man has indicated a desire for re-election to a third term, and the abuse of the press has been as gratuitous as it was unjust. But the proposition before us meets, I am sure, the approval of the whole people of these United States, and it is to settle distinctly in the Constitution that which was omitted by its framers, and provide for a single term. The assertion that it limits the power of the people has no force. All constitutional provisions and all regulations for elections are limits. To follow the course indicated would be to allow mass conventions at any moment to elect such officers as they pleased. The will of the people is law, but the people provide limitations as to the mode of its exercise in constitutions; for nothing is law nor can have the sanctity thereof, but the will of the people legitimately expressed.

This question left open was decided in the Farewell Address of Washington in these patriotic words in which he declined re-election, and which have gone down not only into the history of your country but into the bosoms of the American people as the great unwritten law of the land. No man has ever been elected to a third term. We propose in this instance to fix it distinctly and to get rid of what is now a disturbing element. I differ from the gentlemen who think it is a question which we ought not to discuss. I think it is a question which it is right to discuss. I think it is a question which is proper to be met, and I think it is best met by the proposition of the minority of the committee reported by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. KNOTT. Have I any time left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HALE.) The gentleman has ten minutes of his time left.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for a vote.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee to allow me to submit an amendment. I am not satisfied with the amendment precisely that is proposed, nor am I satisfied with the amendment to the amendment reported by the minority, and I desire to have an opportunity to report an amendment which covers my views and which I think covers the views of several other members.

Mr. KNOTT. The previous question has been sustained, and I have no further control over the joint resolution in regard to admitting amendments.

Mr. REAGAN. Am I not in order to offer an amendment now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. HALE.) No further amendment is in order, the previous question having been sustained.

Mr. REAGAN. May I have my amendment read, and then ask unanimous consent to have a vote taken upon it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky will confine the operation of the previous question to the pending amendment, so that the various amendments may be submitted and voted on one after another.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think the gentleman from Kentucky had better agree to that, that the operation of the previous question shall be considered as applying to the pending amendment alone.

The SPEAKER, (having resumed the chair.) The Chair understands the present situation to be this: That the gentleman from Kentucky demanded the previous question on the original joint resolution and the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] representing the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was the previous question called on the whole of the pending measure?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that anything is pending before the House except the original joint resolution and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the previous question operating on the amendment only, or on both the amendment and the original joint resolution?

The SPEAKER. On both.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] suggests that it be understood that the previous question shall apply only upon the pending amendment, so that other amendments may be offered.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Kentucky consent to that understanding?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky that the previous question be confined to the pending amendment, so that all these other various propositions may be voted on.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to consent that my amendment be read for information.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I make the point of order that it is impossible to hear what is going on owing to the confusion prevailing in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken. Gentlemen will be in order.

The Chair will now inquire again whether the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] yields for any modification of the existing order?

Mr. KNOTT. I do not.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand that there is a little of the hour of the gentleman from Kentucky which has not been exhausted. I will ask that in what little time remains to him he will allow me to have my amendment read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. REAGAN. Then it has been since this colloquy commenced.

The SPEAKER. It has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to appeal to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to allow an amendment to his report, so that we shall have an opportunity of adopting his joint resolution with the single change making the term six years instead of four.

Mr. REAGAN. That is precisely my amendment, and I can say to the gentleman from Kentucky that he will embarrass himself and others if he does not admit it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. KASSON. Then, sir, to test the sense of the House, I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I now offer the following amendment as a substitute both for the original report of the committee and the pending amendment:

That no person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President shall ever hereafter be eligible to said office.

That the term of office of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be six years.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a few words only. I have not participated in this debate, and I shall not now participate in the discussion of the general question. I am not satisfied with the amendment to the Constitution proposed by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, nor do I feel satisfied with the amendment offered by the minority. I therefore offer this amendment, which will take effect from its adoption, if it shall be adopted. I desire to see the presidential term made for six years and for a single term.

The SPEAKER. Inasmuch as the Chair has not been occupying the chair during the whole of this discussion he desires to inquire whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is offered as a substitute to the original bill or as an amendment to the substitute of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE?]

Mr. REAGAN. I offered it as a substitute for the original bill and the substitute of the gentleman from Maine.

The SPEAKER. That is in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas a single question. Suppose his amendment prevails, what effect would it have on the term commencing the 4th of March, 1877?

Mr. REAGAN. If it should be adopted before that time it would exclude any one from being elected to the Presidency who has occupied the presidential chair heretofore.

Mr. HUNTON. But suppose the amendment be adopted after the presidential election and before the inauguration of the President elected, what effect will it then have on the term of the President elected but not yet inaugurated?

Mr. REAGAN. I have not considered that question, but I do not conceive that it could affect the term of the President elected under the previous provision of the Constitution.

Mr. HUNTON. I suggest to the gentleman that he perfect his amendment, by saying that it shall not go into operation until the 4th of March, 1881, so as not to affect the President to be elected for the next term.

Mr. REAGAN. I prefer submitting the amendment in the form in which it now stands, but I have no objection to the gentleman offering an amendment to that effect.

Mr. KASSON. I call for the reading of the substitute of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and then of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk again read the amendments.

Mr. KASSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the previous question, but before doing so I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I desire to say simply a word relative to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas. There are fatal objections to it, and this would be fatal; the question asked by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] was, does this affect the next presidential term, does it extend the term of four years to six? Now, the moment you go to the people of this country with a question of that magnitude undecided, unsettled, it is utterly fatal, and the adoption of that amendment by the people will be utterly and entirely hopeless.

Then again, if it is decided that it does affect the next presidential term, extending it from four to six years, as I said yesterday, you go then to the people, and the majority who elect the next President would every single man of them vote for the proposition and every man of the minority would vote against it, because it would be an extension of the term of the President already elected representing the majority.

Now, the opposition of any minority so large as that represented by either political party in this country would be utterly fatal to the adoption of an amendment of this character. Why, sir, if any amendment making a six-years term is to go to the people with the slightest hope or expectation of its adoption by the people, you must inevitably remove it beyond the influence of the next eight years or the next two terms.

Mr. REAGAN. I will modify my amendment in accordance with the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] and that will obviate the objection of the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] so as to provide for its taking effect, if adopted, from and after March 4, 1881.

Mr. FRYE. Then does not the gentleman put the matter in precisely this position: that the next man elected President of the United States of all the men elected or to be elected will be the one man limited to a term of four years? And will not all the friends of that President so elected say that "this is an invidious distinction against our President, and therefore we will vote against this amendment;" and will not that prevent its adoption by three-fourths of the States?

Mr. REAGAN. I do not think that a just argument against my amendment as modified. If the one who shall be elected President under the Constitution shall hold his office for the constitutional term of four years, neither he nor his friends can complain. We are not proposing an amendment to suit the views or aspirations of any single person or party, but to conserve the public liberties of this country.

Mr. KASSON. I propose to move the previous question, but I will avail myself of this opportunity to say a single word. For the first time in the history of this country it is proposed to amend the Constitution so as to limit the rights of the people and to take away from them the reserved right they now have in their choice of President. For that reason I have entertained serious doubts as to the propriety of adopting any of these propositions. I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] that the proposition last submitted by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] can hardly receive the sanction of the House. Accordingly I call for the previous question in order that we come to a vote upon the several propositions now pending.

Mr. NEW. Would it be in order to move to recommit this whole subject to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. KASSON. I think that motion would not be in order pending my call for the previous question.

Mr. NEW. I desire to make that motion.

Mr. KASSON. I will withdraw the call for the previous question in order that the motion to recommit may be in order.

Mr. NEW. I move to recommit the joint resolution and pending amendments to the Committee on the Judiciary without instructions.

Mr. KASSON. I now renew my call for the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. Being opposed to any amendment to the Constitution of this character, I wish to say that, as one of the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, so far as I am personally concerned I am in favor of the motion to recommit.

The previous question was then seconded.

The main question was ordered upon a division—ayes 127, noes 42.

The question was then taken upon the motion to recommit; and upon a division there were—ayes 93, noes 79.

Before the result of the vote was announced,

Mr. KNOTT called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to have the Speaker state to the House, so that we can all understand, whether, if the motion to recommit shall be voted down, the previous question having been ordered, the House will then be brought to a direct vote first upon the amendments and then upon the joint resolution itself?

The SPEAKER. If the motion to recommit shall fail, the Chair understands that the joint resolution will remain before the House.

Mr. HOSKINS. To be voted upon directly, first the amendments and then the joint resolution?

Mr. GARFIELD. The previous question will operate until the final action of the House upon the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that if the motion to recommit shall fail the previous question will have exhausted itself, and the joint resolution will remain before the House.

Mr. HOSKINS. That is the very point upon which I wish to have the ruling of the Chair. With the permission of the Chair I will say that, in my opinion, the previous question having been called and ordered upon the motion to recommit, if that motion shall fail, then the previous question will attach to the joint resolution and the House will be at once brought to a vote first upon the amendments and then upon the joint resolution itself; all further opportunity for amendment will be cut off.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the previous question to relate to the joint resolution and pending amendments, but only to the motion to recommit.

Mr. KASSON. The Chair is correct, for I confined the call for the previous question particularly to the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding of the Chair. The question now is upon the call of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] for the yeas and nays upon the motion to recommit.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that it might be a saving of time to take the vote by tellers instead of calling the yeas and nays.

Mr. KNOTT. I prefer to have the yeas and nays at once.

Mr. HOSKINS. With all due deference to the Chair, I hold that, the previous question having been ordered, it cannot exhaust itself upon the motion to recommit unless that motion shall be carried. It necessarily applies to the motion to recommit; but should that motion fail, then it will also attach to the joint resolution, and not be exhausted until the final vote upon that joint resolution. Even if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] made the call for the previous question to apply directly to the motion to recommit, the previous question cannot be exhausted there, and is not exhausted there should the motion to recommit be voted down.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not necessary to decide that point at this time.

Mr. HOSKINS. But its decision might influence somewhat the votes of members upon the pending motion.

The SPEAKER. The first question is, Will the House order the yeas and nays upon the motion to recommit?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 127, nays 127, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Atkins, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Barnum, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, William P. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, Willis, Wilshire, and Benjamin Wilson—127.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Blaine, Bliss, Blount, Buckner, Cason, Caswell, Chapin, Cox, Danford, Dobbins, Evans, Goode, Gunter, Hale, Hartridge, Hays, Hoar, Hoge, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, Lamar, Money, Pu man, Rea, James B. Reilly, Schleicher, Sheakley, John W. Wallace, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, and Alan Wood, jr.—36.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague, Mr. DANFORD, requested me to state upon any call of the yeas and nays that he is absent by order of the House upon a committee.

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague, Mr. WHITTHORNE, is absent with a committee that has gone to Norfolk.

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. GOODE, is detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. HUNTER. My colleague, Mr. CASON, is quite ill; that is the reason of his absence.

The roll-call being concluded,

The SPEAKER said: Upon this question the yeas are 127 and the nays 127. The Chair votes "nay." So the pending bill and the substitute therefor are not recommitted. The Chair holds, upon reflection, that this is not a case in which the gentleman moving the previous question could limit the effect thereof. Therefore the question now is first upon the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The substitute was read, as follows:

That no person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President shall ever be eligible to said office.

That the term of office of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be six years from and after the 4th of March, 1881.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. It occurs to me that there is a verbal error in the amendment just read. It declares that no person who may "hereafter" be elected President shall "hereafter" be eligible. There is evidently a mistake.

Mr. REAGAN. If there be no objection, I will modify my amendment by substituting the word "thereafter" for "hereafter" where it occurs the second time.

There being no objection, the amendment was modified accordingly.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would like to make an inquiry as to the effect of this proposition. Would this exclude from the right to be elected to the office of President a person who, having been elected Vice-President, had succeeded to the office of President and had served, it may be, only a month?

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the roll-call will proceed.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 71, nays 184, not voting 35; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banks, Bradley, Bright, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Cannon, Chapin, Clymer, Cochrane, Cook, Cowan, Douglas, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Felton, Forney, Robert Hamilton, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hatcher, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Hopkins, House, Lane, Lewis, Edmund W. M. Mackey, Levi A. Mackey, Maish, Milliken, Mills, Morgan, Payne, Phelps, William A. Wallace, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, James Williams, and Alan Wood, jr.—34.

So Mr. REAGAN'S substitute was rejected.

The question recurred on the following amendment of Mr. FRYE:

Strike out "no person who has held or may hereafter hold the office of President, shall ever again be eligible to said office," and insert in lieu thereof the following:

From and after the 4th day of March, in the year 1885, the term of office of President and Vice-President of the United States shall be six years; and any person having been elected to and held the office of President, or who, for two years, has held such office, shall be ineligible to a re-election.

Mr. BANKS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 107, nays 143, not voting 39; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ashe, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banks, Blaine, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cate, Chittenden, Clymer, Cochrane, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Farwell, Faulkner, Foster, Freeman, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Woodburn, and Young—143.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Bliss, Blount, William P. Caldwell, Cason, Caswell, Cox, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Gibson, Goode, Gunter, Hale, Hartridge, Hays, Henkle, Hoar, Hoge, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, Lamar, McFarland, Money, Morey, O'Brien, Purman, James B. Reilly, Schleicher, Schumaker, John W. Wallace, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, Alan Wood, jr., and Fernando Wood—39.

So Mr. FRYE'S amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, (two-thirds of each House concurring therein,) That the following be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which, when ratified by three-fourths of said Legislatures, shall be valid as a part of said Constitution:

ARTICLE XVI.

No person who has held, or may hereafter hold, the office of President shall ever again be eligible to said office.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I ask whether it would not be better to strike out the word "ever," as it adds nothing to the sense, while it detracts very much from the elegance of the text.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PAGE demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. WHITE. I move the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 145, nays 108, not voting 36; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banks, Banning, Barnum, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Candler, Cate, Caulfield, Chapin, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cook, Cowan, Crounse, Culberson, Cutler, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Douglas, Dunnell, Durand, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Faulkner, Felton, Forney, Franklin, Frost, Fuller, Gause, Gibson, Glover, Goodin, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartzell, Hatcher, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hopkins, House, Hunton, Hurd, Thomas L. Jones, Knott, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Lynde, Levi A. Phillips, Piper, Poppleton, Powell, Reagan, John Reilly, Rice, Riddle, John Robbins, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Miles Ross, Savage, Sayler, Scales, Schleicher, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Tarbox, Terry, Thompson, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Ward, Warren, Erastus Wells, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Alpheus S. Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, and Yeates—145.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Blaine, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Campbell, Cannon, Chittenden, Conger, Crapo, Davy, Denison, Eames, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Harris, Hathorn, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Hooker, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kehr, Ketchum, Kimball, King, Lapham, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Lynch, Edmund W. M. Mackey, Magoon, MacDougall, McCrary, McDill, Miller, Monroe, Nash, Neal, New, Norton, Oliver, O'Neill, Packer, Page, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Potter, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, Randall, Robinson, Sobieski Ross, Rusk, Sampson, Seelye, Sinnickson, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, Strait, Stowell, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, Walls, Walsh, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whiting, Wike, Willard, Charles G. Williams, William B. Williams, James Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—108.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Bass, Bliss, Blount, William P. Caldwell, Cason, Caswell, Cox, Danford, Darrall, Dobbins, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Goode, Gunter, Hartridge, Hays, Henkle, Hoar, Hoge, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kelley, Lamar, Money, Morey, O'Brien, Rea, James B. Reilly, Schumaker, John W. Wallace, Whitthorne, Andrew Williams, James Williams, Alan Wood, jr., and Young—36.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the joint resolution was rejected.

Mr. RANDALL. I enter the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution, and also to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was rejected.

The SPEAKER. The motions to reconsider will be entered.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 204) to remove the political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida; and

An act (H. R. No. 785) to extend the time for stamping unstamped instruments.

SHIPPING ACT OF 1872.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has received this afternoon a communication from the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, transmitting preamble and resolutions of that body relative to the proposed modification of the shipping act of 1872, title 53, Revised Statutes. He asks leave to refer it without printing to the Committee on Commerce, in accordance with the request of the exchange.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

JOSEPH S. WILSON.

On motion of Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the case of Joseph S. Wilson.

And then, on motion of Mr. SPRINGER, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1796) to grant an American register to the Hawaiian bark Arctic was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in answer to a Senate resolution of January 31, 1876, information in relation to the taxation of lands granted to States and corporations; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the petition and resolutions of a meeting of workingmen of the city of Detroit, Michigan, held January 15, 1876, praying for the repeal of the resumption act; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PATTERSON presented the petition of A. M. Blake, praying compensation for losses sustained by him during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of Kentucky, praying for the repeal of the two-cent stamp tax on bank-checks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SPENCER presented the memorial of Jones M. Withers, attorney for the Mobile Marine Dock Company, asking payment for the occupation and use of property and material of that company by military authorities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I present the petition and resolutions passed at a meeting of workingmen of the city of Detroit, Michigan, in favor of the repeal of the specie resumption act, so called. In presenting these resolutions I wish to say that for myself I do not agree either in the premises or in the conclusion of the resolutions. I move their reference to the Committee on Finance, hoping that they will take the resolutions into serious consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAGIN presented the petition of Secor & Co., and Perine, Secor & Co., praying compensation for losses sustained through the action of the Government in building certain vessels of war and in relation to sundry payments received by them as extras on these vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRAGIN. I also present the petition of Samuel S. Smoot, president of the Southern Maryland Railroad Company, praying for the passage of a law guaranteeing the interest on the bonds of that railroad company. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Railroads, and I am requested to move also that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Railroads and be printed, if no objection is made.

Mr. SHERMAN. To print a petition is contrary to the rule unless for some special reason. I object to its being printed unless the Senator from New Hampshire can state a good reason, as an exception to the rule, why it should be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of J. F. Lamb and several other citizens of the State of Kansas, praying the passage of Senate bill No. 33 for the relief of certain settlers upon homestead and preemption lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. KELLY presented the petition of the board of county commissioners of Walla Walla County, Washington Territory, praying Congress to annex that county to the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I present the memorial of the Washington Light Infantry of South Carolina and the Clinch Rifles of Georgia, asking Congress to authorize the Secretary of War to issue through the governors of their respective States two hundred and forty improved breech-loading rifles, for the use of their commands, to enable those companies to participate in celebrating the national centennial in Philadelphia on the 4th of July, 1876. I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, relating to the surplus revenue distributed for the use of the States in 1834. I ask that the resolution be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be reported if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the treasurer of the State of New Jersey, in his report of credits and securities belonging to the State fund, reports bonds of the several counties of the State for the surplus revenue of the United States $764,670.44, which stand on his books as a loan to the counties and due the State, and the United States Treasurer holds certificates against the State of New Jersey for the same, which stands charged on the books of the United States Treasurer with that amount, showing an indebtedness of this State to the United States for the amount named above, and the treasurer of this State has reported annually for nearly forty years these securities, showing no interest paid by the counties to the State, neither has there been any interest paid by the State to the United States on the same; and whereas the said securities due by the counties to the State are for the amount of surplus revenue deposited with the State of New Jersey under an act of Congress of June 23, 1836, ordering "that the money which shall be in the Treasury of the United States on the 1st day of January, 1837, reserving the sum of $5,000,000, shall be deposited with the several States in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States;" and whereas the State of New Jersey under said act received as her proportion of the said surplus revenue the sum of $764,670.44, and distributed the same among the counties of the State on the ratio of their valuations for taxation, receiving their bonds for the same; and whereas no call has ever been made upon this State or upon any other of the States for the return of this money so deposited; and whereas, in the settlement of the claims of this State against the Treasury of the United States for expenses incurred in raising and forwarding troops during the late unhappy civil war, no offset was claimed by the United States Treasurer on account of the said money so deposited with this State in 1837, the same course having been pursued with the other States, and in no case any claim made for credit or offset on account of said money so deposited; and whereas the general opinion was at the time the law was enacted, and still is, that the said deposits were only so in name, but in reality was a distribution of an excess of taxation levied upon the people of the United States; (in the debate in Congress at the time the act was under consideration it was spoken of as "returning these deposits to the people by whom they were paid," and was treated as a "distribution in its consequences," and, said a member, "it is viewed as an indirect distribution, those who voted for it considering it a mere deposit measure;") and whereas the said money so deposited still appears on the books of the Treasurer of the United States as a charge against the several States and as an available fund at command of the United States Treasury: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to present the following resolution for action by Congress and use their influence for its passage:

"Whereas the thirteenth section of the act of Congress of June 23, 1836, was so construed at the United States Treasury as authorizing a deposit with the States of that amount of money from the Treasury, which amount has, since said deposit was made, been included in the balance of the Treasury from year to year: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and hereby is, authorized and directed to cause the proper entries to be made on the books of the Department to relieve the several States from all liability to the Government on account of the respective amounts deposited with them in accordance with the provisions of said act."

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions, signed by the governor, be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to be presented to their respective bodies.

J. D. BEDLE.
Governor.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislature of Iowa, asking legislation by Congress in favor of a commercial highway by water between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan via the valleys of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a preamble and resolutions of the Maritime Exchange of Philadelphia, relative to the proposed modification of the shipping act of 1872, title 53, of the Revised Statutes; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 123) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 89) to amend the act entitled "An act granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and the widows of deceased soldiers," approved February 14, 1871, and to restore to the pension-rolls those persons whose names were stricken therefrom in consequence of disloyalty, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 205) authorizing the Commissioner of Pensions to place upon the pension-roll the name of the widow of Captain David Ritchie, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Cunningham, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Fleming Crump and William Williamson, praying to be allowed pensions, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WITHERS. The principle involved in all of these cases is the same, that these parties have never applied to the Pension Bureau for pensions, and the committee therefore ask to be relieved from the further consideration of the petitions in order that they may be referred to the Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. BOOTH. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 188) granting a pension to Patterson McNutt, to report it adversely. At the request of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] I ask that the bill be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SPENCER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 395) for the relief of the Mobile Marine Dock Company; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 396) to aid in the construction of the Southern Maryland Railroad, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 397) for the relief of Andrew M. Banks; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of E. M. Hart be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DAVIS. I also present a letter relating to this case, which I move be referred to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. CRAGIN, it was Ordered, That the memorial of John Holroyd be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion of Mr. INGALLS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Anton Tschudi be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

POTOMAC AQUEDUCT BRIDGE.

Mr. ROBERTSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to detail as early as possible an officer of engineers to make an examination of and report upon the present condition as respects safety and permanency of the Aqueduct bridge over the Potomac River at Georgetown, District of Columbia.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HITCHCOCK submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing a proper form of government for the District of Columbia, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. CLAYTON. I now ask to take up the unfinished business pending at the conclusion of the morning hour yesterday.

Mr. EATON. I ask the Senator from Arkansas to give way to me for a moment in order to enable me to introduce a resolution that will not take time I should like to have it read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Does the Senator from Connecticut desire action upon his resolution?

Mr. EATON. I do want action on it. I hope there will be no objection to it; but an objection of course will throw it over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will receive the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut subject to objection. The Secretary will read it for information.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds authorized under or by virtue of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited, any law to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I only wish to say a word. Let me give the reason for offering the resolution, even if no vote is taken upon it.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think it very clear it cannot be passed this morning. That question is really before the Senate in another shape.

Mr. SHERMAN. That subject will come up regularly at one o'clock.

Mr. EATON. I ask the Senate to hear my statement; and then, if debate occurs on a resolution of this character after my statement, of course that will carry it over.

Mr. President, I desire to inform the Senate of a certain state of facts, and if these facts are correct I apprehend there will be a unanimous vote given to my resolution. I obtained these facts from such a source as induces me now to say to the Senate that I have no more doubt of their truth than I would have if one of my brother Senators should assure me of the fact. One week ago to-day, as I am informed and believe, a resolution was passed by the board that has power to issue these 3.65 bonds that no more should be issued for one week, supposing that that time would cover the examination of this question in the House of Representatives and in the Senate. That about that time such a resolution was passed I entertain no doubt. In defiance of that resolution passed by that board, since last Saturday morning, more than $100,000 of these bonds have been issued, as I am informed, not only in violation of the resolution which was passed by the board, but in violation of the will of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. Was that done by the funding commissioners?

Mr. EATON. I have stated to the Senate that it was by the board which has the authority to issue these bonds.

Mr. SARGENT. That is, by the funding commissioners, I believe, one of whom is W. W. Corcoran.

Mr. EATON. I am not here to give the name of any gentleman. I am here to state on my honor as a Senator that I believe everything that I have said to the Senate. I say in violation of their own resolution, in violation of the will of the Congress of the United States, and in violation of the law regarding working on the Sabbath, if there be any such law in the District of Columbia, they have gone on and issued these bonds. I now ask that the resolution may be put upon its passage.

Mr. CLAYTON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution goes over.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. THURMAN to insert at the end of the first section the following proviso:

Provided, That the repeal of said section shall not have the effect to impair the right, complete or inchoate, of any homestead settler; and no land occupied by such settler at the time this act shall take effect shall be subject to entry, pre-emption, or sale.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, fearing that this bill may be defeated because both its object and its effect are much misunderstood, I will detain the Senate but a moment to explain it.

The object of the bill is simply to restore the public lands in the States named therein, namely, in Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, Florida, and Louisiana, to the exact condition that the public lands in the other new States are to-day in Missouri, in Kansas, in Iowa, in Nebraska, and so on. I think there can be no objection to the bill if it is understood. It is simple, and it is just. Formerly the public lands in all the new States were in the same precise condition as to the ability of any person to enter those lands at private entry at the minimum price of a dollar and a quarter an acre. After a time the pre-emption system was established, which pervaded all these new States equally and alike. Then warrants were issued to the soldiers who had served in the different wars of the Republic, and they were to be located on the lands of the Government in all the new States alike. Then the homestead law was established, and that was to affect the new States all alike.

A short time after the termination of the late war, when the slave population had been emancipated, it was believed by a majority of both branches of Congress that, as that population had no real estate in the different States where they were living, it was necessary to prevent these lands from being entered either at private sale or under pre-emptions or by the location of land warrants, and to reserve them all to be disposed of in the way of homestead entries, the evident intention being to secure the lands in the States named for this recently emancipated population. While the motive was commendable and the object was benevolent, to enable that class of people who heretofore had no real estate to secure real estate, yet the whole policy was founded in very great error and also very great injustice to the States therein named. It then provided by an amendment to the homestead law, which is very incongruous and which must have been adopted without much discussion, that so far as the States named were concerned no public land could be entered or disposed of in those States except in the way of homesteads, believing that the quantity of land was small, and that there was no more in those States than would supply the legitimate demand of the colored population. This was a great mistake; it was a mistake then, and it is a mistake now. If every colored man of the South was to-day provided with one hundred and sixty acres of land, there would yet be millions of acres to be entered. But this excess, as it stands now, cannot be entered. You cannot buy an acre of public land in Alabama, or in Arkansas, or in Louisiana, or in Florida. The consequence is that the vast public domain there remains undisposed of, to the detriment of the Federal Treasury and to the great detriment of those States.

Now, sir, those States, as we know, are in a very depressed condition financially. Nothing can ever relieve them, nothing can raise them from their greatly depressed condition, except an augmented population. You have taken away the whole inducement for immigration to them. It is true that a poor man can go to Florida or Alabama and locate his homestead; but there are many other persons who would like to go to those States who do not choose to go and reside upon public lands for five years. A man to get a homestead has to go on his one hundred and sixty acres of land, make a location in good faith, and remain consecutively upon that land for five years, before he can acquire title. The result is that the lands in all those States remain undisposed of.

The object of this bill is simply to place the lands in those States in the same condition that they are in my State; that is, that they can be entered at a dollar and a quarter an acre; that pre-emptions can be located, and that land warrants can be located, and that homesteads can be located as they are now. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is evidently founded in error. His object is to protect persons who have already as it were initiated their homestead rights. This bill does not affect them at all. Persons in those States who have taken any step toward securing a homestead are not affected by this bill. This bill does not reach the question of homesteads in any shape or form. It only says that in addition to homesteads, lands can be acquired in those States also by entry at a dollar and a quarter an acre and by pre-emption and by location of land warrants. Why should it not be so?

If we deprived the colored population of the ability of securing homes by the location of homesteads, perhaps it would be well to retain the law as it is now; but such is not the fact. There are millions of acres of lands in those States beyond what they can want at any time. They never can take them.

Mr. INGALLS. Would it interrupt the Senator if I were to ask if he can inform the Senate what proportion of the area of the States named in this bill remains public domain and open to pre-emption or homestead entry?

Mr. BOGY. I cannot give a definite answer. All I know as a general fact is that there is a very large quantity of public lands yet remaining in the State of Florida, perhaps one-half the whole area of the State; also in Alabama; not so large in Louisiana or Mississippi, and yet very considerable in both those States; and a very large proportion in the State of Arkansas. I will state this fact beyond the possibility of being contradicted, that there is more land in each and all of these States twice, three times, four times over than can be taken by the colored population if every one of them made a location of one hundred and sixty acres of land.

This law is perfectly ruinous to those States. I know in regard to the State of Arkansas where mineral developments are being brought to light every day, persons have come to Saint Louis to obtain capital to purchase lands in Arkansas for the purpose of going into mining operations, and they have not been able to secure the land because there is only one way to get land in Arkansas, and that is by going on one hundred and sixty acres of land, living upon that tract, and taking an oath that you intend to remain on that land. The consequence is that persons who desire to become purchasers for the purpose of going into mining operations and of developing the resources of that State are precluded; and this keeps these States in a sad condition all the time. If this be charity, (and it was meant to be charity, and the motive was commendable,) it was, to say the least of it, charity provided for one set of persons at the expense of another. It is not the charity commended by the law; very far from it. It is not charity that goes from your own purse and your own means. It was charity at the expense of these States because it prevented emigration going to those States.

The bill is simple. The reason why I have felt it my duty to say anything on the subject now is because last year the same bill passed the House, and it came to the Senate; but owing to a misapprehension that there was something wrong it it, and Senators not investigating the matter, it was defeated. Now, I say it is a just measure.

Mr. CLAYTON. The Senator is mistaken about the bill having been defeated in the Senate. It was reported back from the Committee on Public Lands favorably; but there were other provisions, very large provisions, in relation to other portions of the laws relative to the sale of lands, incorporated with this provision, and it failed to receive action. There was no action by the Senate upon it.

Mr. BOGY. I understood that to be a fact, but I desired to make my speech very short and did not go into the explanation in detail; but the same provision was in that bill. The bill was amended, and we were not able to strike off the amendments because the subject was not understood.

Now, sir, to conclude my remarks, the whole effect, the whole object, the intent of this bill, is merely to say that public lands in Louisiana, in Alabama, in Mississippi, in Florida, and in Arkansas shall be hereafter liable to be purchased at $1.25 an acre or can be taken up with land-warrants in the same way that public lands can be taken up in Missouri, Iowa, and other States that have public lands; and the persons who have located homesteads in any of these States are in no way, shape, or form, in the most distant manner imaginable affected by this bill at all. It opens the gate to emigration to these States, which certainly ought to be done.

The bill ought to pass, and the amendment of the Senator from Ohio is entirely unnecessary, and of course should not be adopted. I remember he said to me yesterday if it does not affect the bill why not pass it? That is not the way. The question is affirmative. Does the bill provide anything which the amendment goes to modify? It does not. It does not affect homesteads; homesteads remain the same as they are now.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee who reported this bill, for my own information, whether they considered particularly the effect of the repeal of this section in view of section 12 of chapter 2 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

> Whenever an act is repealed which repealed a former act, such former act shall not thereby be revived unless it shall be expressly so provided.

I should like to know whether the committee have looked at the effect of the repeal of this section in view of the section to which I have referred, so that we shall be assured that the right of pre-emption and the right of private entry exist together if this section shall be repealed?

Mr. WINDOM. I will say to my colleague that the particular question which he presents was never discussed, I believe, in the committee; at least not within my recollection. But as the section repealed is only a restriction upon a former law, I cannot conceive that there is any difficulty in respect to what he states. It was not discussed before the committee, however. I cannot answer what view the committee took of it.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I asked the question for information, so that there may be no mistake.

Mr. BOGY. Will the Senator pardon me? I think this would be the effect of it, and I am very clear on that point: The amendment which is now attempted to be repealed by this bill is to the homestead law. That homestead law provided for the location of homesteads in all the States having public lands. This amendment excepted a few of those States. By repealing the amendment which excepted those States the law remains in operation, and includes and covers all the States having public lands. I think that is clearly the effect.

Mr. WINDOM. This restrictive act simply withdrew from the operation of the general laws the public lands in those States. It seems to me that repealing that act of withdrawal or restriction will certainly leave the lands as they were before, subject to the general laws; but I only give my own opinion, which is not worth so much as that of my colleague on such a subject.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I express no opinion in regard to the effect of the repeal.

Mr. INGALLS. I desire to ask the Senator from Arkansas if he can furnish the Senate with the information that the Senator from Missouri said he was unable to give, in regard to the area of the public lands remaining undisposed of in the five States named in this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I can, as I have received it from the Land Department. The entire area of the State of Arkansas is 33,406,720 acres; the entire area remaining undisposed of and still held by the Government, independently of railroad grants, amounts to 8,880,700 acres.

Mr. INGALLS. About 25 per cent.

Mr. CLAYTON. About 25 per cent. in Arkansas. In Louisiana the entire area of the State is 26,461,440 acres; and there remain unsold, independent of railroad grants, 5,884,888 acres.

Mr. INGALLS. What per cent. is that?

Mr. CLAYTON. About 20 per cent. In Mississippi the entire area is 30,179,840 acres. There remain undisposed of 4,263,520 acres, or about 14 per cent. In Alabama the entire area is 32,462,080 acres; undisposed of, 4,637,808 acres, about one-eighth, or 12 per cent. In Florida the entire area is 37,931,520 acres; undisposed of, 16,946,426, or nearly one-half.

Mr. INGALLS. Is it the understanding of the Senator that the great portion of this land is what is known as timber land?

Mr. CLAYTON. It is.

Mr. INGALLS. What species or variety of timber?

Mr. CLAYTON. In my own State, Arkansas, the bulk of it is covered with pine and a kind of scrub oak. Some portions of it are covered with oak, but that portion which has not got pine upon it is not covered with a very valuable variety of timber. The only timber in our State that is valuable, or likely to become valuable, is pine timber; but the pine timber on these lands is rather sparse. The trees themselves are large, but the growth is sparse.

Mr. INGALLS. Is the land fit for agriculture?

Mr. CLAYTON. I said yesterday that it was not. Any one who is familiar with that character of land will at once understand that it is not; and there are Senators here who have passed through Arkansas and who, visiting the State, have seen these lands. They can state themselves, if they desire to do so, the character of the lands they discovered in passing through the State. Of course, so far as the character of land in other Southern States is concerned, I cannot speak as to all of my own knowledge, but I learn on reliable information that those lands are of the same character.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, I will offer a word in support of the measure of the Senator from Arkansas, and I will speak entirely of my own State. It was said yesterday by the Senator from Vermont not now in his seat [Mr. EDMUNDS] that it was in consideration of the helpless condition of the colored people of the South that this homestead law was applied in its present form to the five States mentioned. It is true that the colored people were in a very helpless condition. Four million of those people were emerging from slavery. Made free and brought into the bright sunlight of liberty, they came without even a title to the clothes upon their backs, and they had not even a mouthful of food, and they had not an acre of land. They had not a roof with which they could cover their heads. Congress in its mercy, so far as Mississippi is concerned, when these people held up their hands and asked for bread, gave them in return a pine lot in the form of a homestead law. I am not undertaking to reflect upon the Government, for I know very well its condition and the peculiar condition of the colored people. It was a dilemma; and doubtless those who voted for this law supposed they were giving the colored people in the State of Mississippi an opportunity whereby they could secure to themselves homesteads. Now the fact exists that, in Mississippi, the lands that were offered to the negro as a homestead had been, under the graduation laws of the Government of the United States, reduced down to twelve and a half cents an acre and had been held for a number of years at twelve and a half cents an acre and were not entered, at a time, too, when the lands in Mississippi were worth, I am scarcely able to compute the per cent. but I will say, immeasurably more than they are to-day. For example, land in the district in which I live that was selling for $50 an acre when the war began, can be bought to-day much of it for $5 an acre. I have known some of it to sell for $2.50 an acre, and this is improved land, land that had been entered for forty years and that had become the subject of cultivation. This, however, is owing to the imperfect levee system we have, by which that land and the most productive and fertile regions of the country have become subject to annual inundation. I will not, however, elaborate upon this branch of the subject, but will go more directly to the point.

In the tributaries of Pearl River, bordering on the Gulf of Mexico, upon the southern border of Mississippi, there are large areas of valuable pine land. The timber interest in that country has devoloped since the close of the war. These lands are not fit for cultivation. They are sterile, and they are only valuable for the timber. While I had the honor to act as governor of Mississippi, I called the attention of the Government authorities to the fact that this land was being depredated upon by various persons engaged in floating timber to the mills. Hundred of acres perhaps were being denuded each year. I sought to inaugurate some system of prosecution on the part of the government of Mississippi, whereby these people would be hindered and whereby they would be restrained from their peculations upon the lands of the Government of the United States. This being, however, the property of the Government of the United States, and not the property of Mississippi, and the General Government having its own laws for the protection of its own property, I found that I was unable to do what I proposed. I called the attention of the Government authorities to the matter, and upon one occasion did succeed in having an agent sent there, having already had an agent put there on the part of the State of Mississippi, but the whole thing resulted in this: The influences were very large, and it was impossible to do anything at all. The mill-owners did not stop to inquire where the timber came from out of which they made their lumber, and the men engaged in rafting timber had each perhaps forty or sixty acres of land along the tributaries of some of these streams, and upon that they could float and deliver any quantity of timber that might be desired. Men from various portions of the United States were engaged in this timber business.

Now, so far as Mississippi is concerned, I do not know that my State is particularly interested in this law, for certain it is that there has been no considerable quantity of land entered there under the homestead law; and if it was to remain on the statute-book for fifty years to come I doubt if as much as five thousand acres would be taken under it. But I may be mistaken in this. The interest, however, to the Government lies in this: If this land was made subject to entry it would be entered by those who would desire to speculate upon the timber; this would bring about a competition in the way of the entry of the land and its purchase from the Government of the United States. That would bring revenue to the Government; whereas if the present law remains the timber will be taken, the land will be stripped, and will be valueless upon the hands of the Government. That is just about the effect it will have.

I will vote for the bill for the reason that I think this kind of peculating and plundering of the public lands ought to be suppressed, for it is demoralizing, and men ought to be taught that they must own property before they undertake to despoil it. From the fact that the timber is valuable I have no doubt that there will be large entries made for the purpose of using the timber. At the mouth of Pearl River there are a great number of mills that have risen up since the war; these mills are tributary to the Government lands, or the Government lands are tributary to the mills; they supply them with the timber. Now, if you pass this bill, the Government will get pay for the land at a dollar and a quarter an acre. If you do not pass the bill the peculation upon the public timber will go on, unless you can inaugurate some system for the arrest and punishment of the people who are engaged in this, and their numbers I am told are great—some system I mean that I have not been able to find which would be at all practicable.

I shall be very glad myself, for the reasons I have stated, that the bill shall pass. So far as the colored people are concerned, so far as the poor of the State are concerned, the present law amounts to nothing.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, I have no desire to retard the settlement, delay the population, or interfere with the prosperity of the Southern States, particularly of those named in this bill; but we have reached a point in the history of legislation touching the public domain when it is important that we should tread the paths of our feet with more circumspection than we have heretofore displayed. It seems almost incredible, and yet it is I believe absolutely true, that we have practically reached the limit of the agricultural area open to homestead or pre-emption settlement in this country.

There is no doubt that the purposes of the framers of the law that is now sought to be repealed were benevolent. It now seems probable, in view of what has been said to-day and yesterday, that the statute has failed to meet the expectations of those who framed it, and has not justified the arguments that were advanced originally in its support. That alone would appear to justify the Senators from those States in asking a repeal of the law if there were not some other reasons that demanded its continuance or modification.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact that the homestead and pre-emption laws, distinctively so called, were enacted in the interest of agriculture. They were intended to apply to agricultural lands. Their object was to benefit the farmers of the country, upon the theory that the perpetuity of free institutions depended upon a great body of freeholders who were attached to the soil.

Now, sir, it is admitted in the arguments of all the Senators who have urged the passage of this bill that none of this land is agricultural. The Senator from Arkansas says the lands in his State are what are known as pine barrens, covered to a great extent with heavy timber, which being removed the land will be valueless for purposes of agriculture. The same I believe to be true with regard to the cypress swamps of Louisiana and the everglades of Florida. When the timber is removed the lands will be absolutely worthless for cultivation. Therefore I say that in no proper sense can they ask the application of the homestead and pre-emption laws to the lands that are now under consideration.

In this connection I will callthe attention of the Senate to the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office in his report for the current year upon this subject. Referring to what he claims to be an omission in the laws governing the disposition of the public lands, and alluding to those that have a specific or special value, such as those containing gold, iron, silver, lead, cinnabar, sulphur, copper, and other metals, he then calls attention to the pine lands, and says:

> The product of these lands is of universal use, and forms the staple of commerce of no inconsiderable portion of the nation.

He recommends that a law be passed providing—

> First. That pine and fir lands shall not be subject to entry under the pre-emption and homestead laws.
>
> Second. That a system of survey shall be devised by which the quantity of pine or fir in each smallest subdivision of a section may be at least closely approximated.
> Third. That an immediate exploration by experts of the unsurveyed portions of those States and Territories known to contain pine or fir be authorized, with the view of ascertaining the geographical situation of pine and fir districts or fields.
> Fourth. That the reports of such explorations be followed by immediate survey of these districts.
>
> Fifth. That survey be followed by immediate appraisal, proclamation, and sale, at not less than the appraised value, and for cash only.

He concludes:

> As I have indicated in the foregoing suggestions, I am strongly of the opinion that the wisest policy the Government can pursue in respect to this class of lands is that which will most speedily divest it of title in the same for a fair consideration, for the reason that depredations to an enormous extent are constantly occurring, which existing laws are powerless to prevent and seemingly equally powerless to punish.

I have no doubt that these lands possess commercial value far in excess of $1.25 per acre. The Senator from Mississippi who has just taken his seat says that they are already largely trespassed upon at the present time by speculators who are endeavoring to obtain possession in violation of existing laws for the purpose of stripping them of their timber. Therefore it would be grossly unjust to the Government, it would be grossly unjust to the Treasury, it would be grossly unjust to those men who, like the farmers of the West, have taken portions of the public domain at a dollar and a quarter an acre, to put these trespassers in possession of heavily timbered lands, worth, I have no doubt at a fair estimate, from fifty to one hundred dollars an acre for the product of the land itself in timber.

I am entirely willing to assist in establishing some system for the disposition and sale of these lands.

Mr. NORWOOD. If the Senator will allow me, I would make a suggestion to him that may throw some light on the value of these lands. In the southern part of Georgia, near the seaboard, pine lands can be bought at from ten to twenty-five cents an acre by the hundred or the thousand acres.

Mr. INGALLS. The reason of that is because that portion of the country has not yet been penetrated by railroads nor reached by proper means of communication.

Mr. NORWOOD. There are four railroads running through it.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Mississippi referred to the fact that previous to the war this land had been graduated down to twelve and a half cents an acre, and remained for a long time unsold. It has undoubtedly enhanced in value since that time by the construction of railroads, by the introduction of northern capital, by the introduction of saw-mills and machinery for the manufacture of lumber; and it is on this account that the land is rapidly becoming valuable for commercial purpose.

Mr. CLAYTON. Will the Senator allow me a word?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAYTON. We have a railroad in Arkansas running east and west through the State. It has a very large land grant on each side of the road. We have another road running north and south through the State; and that has a very large land grant on each side of the road. Those railroad companies are unable to sell their lands to-day at anything like what they hold them for. They cannot get $2 an acre for them.

Mr. INGALLS. Then, if large tracts of this identical description of lands are in the market at prices sufficiently low to accommodate the necessities of the people, what is the purpose of withdrawing this homestead restriction and throwing a vast additional area of land upon the market? The Senator himself says these railroads have land grants lying on either side of their line running diagonally through the State of Arkansas, and those lands are not sought for; they find no purchasers. If that is the case there can be no necessity for repealing the law of 1866, and throwing upon the market millions of acres of public lands still further to depress the price of those that are offered for sale.

Mr. BOGY. Those lands are confined to one or two localities.

Mr. INGALLS. The most desirable localities in a State are near the great lines of communication, certainly, and real estate there should be most sought for and have its highest value.

Mr. CLAYTON. Allow me to answer the Senator. I was told yesterday by the former land officer of the Little Rock and Fort Smith Railroad Company that they had been able occasionally to sell some of their timber land at from three to five dollars an acre. One reason why we want this legislation is that when people who go to the State of Arkansas or live there desire to purchase timber lands they shall not have to go to the railroad companies and pay two or three times as much as they would have to pay to the Government.

Another reason we want it is this: Everything has an infancy. The lumber trade of Michigan at one time was an infant trade. Everything requires time to develop it. We want an opportunity to commence the development of these timber resources—the same opportunity that is given to other States.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer the following amendment, to come in after the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, as an amendment to that amendment:

> Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed in any manner to revive the law commonly called the graduation act.

I think that should be put beyond dispute. Although I have no doubt the Senator's statement may probably be correct, that the graduation act does not apply, I want to be sure of it.

Mr. BOGY. The graduation act was repealed a long time ago.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to be certain that this shall not revive it.

Mr. CLAYTON. If the Senator thinks the graduation act applies, I would ask to have a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office read.

Mr. SARGENT. I shall be very glad to know that the graduation act will not be revived by this bill.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Kansas or rather by way of explanation, that the timber lands of the Government of the United States have not been productive in Mississippi so as to increase the revenues of the Government. The cypress timber of that vast area known as the Mississippi swamp, the delta of the Mississippi, embracing about one-seventh portion of the State, was depredated upon from about the year 1832 up to the time when the Government of the United States ceded the swamp lands to the different States; and perhaps the largest business that there was in the State of Mississippi was the timber business. The lumber business with New Orleans and Vicksburgh was an exceedingly large business. To what extent it went I am not now able to state, but that business was almost entirely carried on by supplies from Government land by the raftsmen; and to such an extent was it carried on that when the swamp lands were ceded to the different States of the South very little of that timber was of any value or was accessible on account of overflow. The States took it in charge, and they attempted to suppress and punish those who depredated upon the land after it became the property of the State. They were not successful until finally a law was passed by the Legislature in Mississippi providing that no one should engage in the business of rafting unless he took out a license to do it, and then he should take an oath that he would not raft upon any other land but his own or upon the land of such person or persons as he might have permission in writing to go upon. This law was now enforced with some degree of rigor, and finally the rafting business was pretty well broken up in the Mississippi swamp. But the State has not undertaken to protect the Government lands. The Government has laws for the protection of its own property. The lands of which I speak, embraced in the 4,000,000 acres undisposed of in Mississippi, are barren pine lands most generally. Those lands are only valuable for any purpose where they may be contiguous to or border upon any of the tributaries that enter into the gulf. If this bill passes, the chances are that 300,000 or 400,000 acres of those lands will be entered; I doubt if so much. The rest of the land cannot be sold for a cent an acre. Nobody would pay the taxes upon it. It would bankrupt any one who undertook to pay taxes upon this land and hold it until such time as he would be able to derive some revenue from it, remote from railroads, remote from settlement, in a barren waste. So this timber stands, valuable if it could be made accessible; but it is not accessible, nor will it be.

Now, sir, if you hold on to the land under the system that obtains in the General Land Office, the result will be that the public land in Mississippi will be valued at less than a cent an acre. From my knowledge of it I would not put it down at anything; but I would say that the man who would take it would be broken up in paying the taxes on it, because under the equalization law of the State he would have to value it at something; the assessor would get a commission for appraising it; he would value it at something, and that something would be just more than the land would be worth when you undertook to pay for it. Why, sir, thousands of acres of land in that delta, in the richest portion of the State of Mississippi, are to-day held by the State for the reason that individuals refuse to pay taxes upon them. Lands that were worth fifteen or twenty dollars an acre before the war are to-day the property of the State of Mississippi for the reason that the owners have yielded them up to the State, refusing to pay taxes upon them. The State of Mississippi owns two million acres of land, some of which was entered at $1.25 an acre, cultivated before the war, and some of which was formerly worth eight or ten dollars an acre, and to-day the owners refuse to go forward and redeem it. At the last session of the Legislature of Mississippi the Legislature proposed to the people who had had lands forfeited and the title to which had vested in the State that the State should relinquish the title upon the condition that they would come forward and pay the taxes of 1874. A few came forward, but some two million acres of land that had been forfeited to the State are still in the hands of the State, the people refusing to take back the title upon condition that they should pay one year's taxes. This is the condition of the land.

As I said a while ago, this bill makes very little difference to my State, but I desire the facts to be correctly stated. These lands are being plundered along the Pearl River and its tributaries. The people will go there. You cannot restrain them. You have no power in this Government to inforce your law; that is, no economical power to prevent depredation on these lands. If you will let them be subject to entry, they will be entered, because private individuals will come and take them in order that they may sell the timber or make those who take the timber off pay something for it. If you do not do that, the timber will be taken off, and that will be the last of it.

Mr. WINDOM. Having reported this bill from the Committee on Public Lands, I may be permitted to very briefly state some of the reasons which induced the committee to recommend its passage. But before doing so, I want to say that while there is no objection whatever to the amendment offered by the Senator from California, it can hardly be necessary. The restrictive act which is sought to be repealed by the bill now pending was passed in 1866. The act which repealed the graduation act was passed in 1862. It can hardly be possible that if we now repeal the restriction imposed in 1866, which in no way refers to that, we shall revive the old act which was repealed in 1862. I have no objection, however, to the amendment.

There seems to be an impression that if this bill shall pass the lands in these five States will be withdrawn from the operation of the homestead law. I wish to correct that error. All the provisions of the homestead law will still apply to these lands. They will be subject to the general land laws of the United States, and any one desiring a homestead upon them will be at liberty to take it. The Commissioner of the General Land Office has been referred to by the Senator from Kansas, and I beg to read a statement made by him bearing directly upon this bill. He says:

The act entitled "An act for the disposal of the public lands for homestead actual settlement in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida," approved June 21, 1866, among other things, provided that from and after that day all the public lands in the States named should be disposed of 'according to the stipulations of the homestead law of 20th May, 1862," and the act supplemental thereto, approved March 21, 1864.

This restriction is continued in force, and is now found embodied in section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

Whatever may have been the exigencies which, at the time of the passage of this act, seemed to justify its policy of exclusion, certain it is that there are not now existing, nor likely to arise in the future, any conditions rendering its continuance necessary.

It is unequal and obnoxious, in that it denies to citizens of the States named the equal privileges enjoyed by their fellow-citizens of other States with respect to lands within their borders. For this reason the section ought to be repealed; but added to this is another reason of grave importance why an early repeal is desirable.

In the States to which this act refers a large, and perhaps the largest, portion of the public lands remaining to the Government is covered with valuable timber.

It is "offered land," and would be in the market for cash sale at private entry but for the act of 1866. The soil of most of this land is notoriously barren, and is valuable only for its timber.

Since the close of the war of the rebellion attention has been attracted to these timbered tracts, and in many localities they have been subject to wholesale depredation, their product forming the basis of a large commerce, employing extensive mills for manufacture, ships for transportation, being distributed generally along the Atlantic sea-board. The wrong thus done the Treasury is not altogether carried on in open defiance of the law, but there is, to some extent, an observance of its forms. Laborers employed in lumbering operations are induced to make homestead entry of desirable tracts, and there is thus obtained shelter from interruption while the work of removing the timber goes on. Once removed, the land is abandoned, and thenceforward, for an indefinite period, may be considered as useless for any purpose. The Treasury, however, has been robbed in the mean time of its value.

The repeal of the existing prohibitions would tend toward a discontinuance of present practices, by enabling persons to acquire title to desirable tracts by direct purchase. In addition to what I have said, looking toward a repeal of the existing prohibition against acquiring title to the lands in question by cash entry, it seems to me proper to suggest that these "timber lands" of the South, and all others of their class—that is, all of the unsold "offered lands," which are chiefly valuable for their timber—might well be made to fall within the rule of exclusion, to the extent, at least, of declaring them not subject to homestead entry; which course has already been recommended in the case of the unoffered and unsurveyed timber lands.

This bill does not, however, go that far.

It is not perceivable upon what rule of justice to the whole people a few are permitted to prey upon the common property, for, as I have before endeavored to make it appear in regard to timbered lands of the class under consideration, their appropriation under the homestead law cannot be followed by their improvement; clearly, therefore, the policy of continuing to hold them subject to homestead entry can find no other defense than that, by so doing, the system of sale is kept uniform.

I do not think that this will be considered, upon due reflection, a sufficient ground for a further sacrifice of the common property.

I think it is agreed by all the Senators and Representatives from those States that, so far as the object sought by the original act is concerned, it has been a failure. There have been but few of these lands taken for actual homesteads, but the homestead law has been used as a cover to enable dishonest persons to strip them of their valuable timber, defraud the Government, and then desert them. This involves under the homestead law an oath on the part of the applicant for homestead that he has settled upon and made improvements upon the land for the purposes of a homestead by improvement and cultivation; and yet, in a very large number of cases, it is wholly untrue. He settles upon it for no such purpose, but solely for the purpose of cover, while the desirable tracts of land are being robbed of their timber and the Government defrauded of the price which it should receive for them.

I believe, sir, that if these lands are open to honest sale by persons desiring to manufacture, the increased business which will result in those States will be of vastly greater benefit to the poor people residing there by giving them employment in the manufacture of lumber than they will ever receive under the existing restriction. And as all who desire homesteads can still take them, I cannot conceive of any possible objection to the repeal of the law. I believe with my friend from Kansas that the homestead bill was originally passed for the benefit of agriculture. Having had some part in its original passage, I know such was the intent of some of its promoters; but that it would ever operate upon such lands as those in the five States referred to I think no one anticipated.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I call for the regular order.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hope the Senator will allow us to come to a vote on this bill. I think we are prepared for a vote.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If we can come to a vote, very well.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have an amendment or two to offer.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish to say a few words on the subject before the debate is through.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, it is the duty of the Chair to declare that the morning hour has expired.

Mr. CLAYTON. I ask the Senate to let us come to a vote on this land bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If there is a disposition to vote——

Mr. CLAYTON. I think we can come to a vote in ten minutes. I do not suppose the Senator from Kansas wishes to speak that long.

Mr. INGALLS. Not very long.

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the matter will go over.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Evidently there is no disposition to come to a vote.

Mr. CLAYTON. We had the bill up yesterday morning, and Senators have had time to inform themselves on the subject. I believe I shall move to postpone the regular order temporarily until we come to a vote on this subject.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Texas has objected, and the Chair announces the unfinished business of yesterday as before the Senate; and now the Senator from Arkansas moves that it be postponed, with all prior orders, for the purpose of continuing the bill which has been under consideration this morning.

The question being put, there were on division—ayes 29, noes 21.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I must demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Dorsey, English, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Robertson, Spencer, West, and Windom—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, McCreery, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Stevenson, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bruce, Burnside, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamlin, Logan, Morton, Ransom, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wallace—14.

So the motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 204) to remove political disabilities of George S. Hawkins, of Florida; and

A bill (H. R. No. 785) to extend the time for stamping unstamped instruments.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as amended; which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] which is in the following words:

Provided, That an issue of said bonds beyond the sum of $15,000,000 is hereby prohibited—by striking out all after the word "provided" and inserting:

That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the amendment as amended; which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment, as amended, reads:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds, and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit, or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it:

And there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Let it be read as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds, and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit, or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000. And there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia.

Mr. HAMILTON. Is it in order to amend further?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HAMILTON. I propose the following amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That the paving and grading of streets and alleys be discontinued until authorized by law.

Mr. DAWES. Before the Senate passes to the consideration of that amendment, I would call the attention of the Senate to an inconsistency in the present phraseology of the amendment, growing out of the different parts of it being put together. There is an inhibition upon the further issuing of any of these 3.65 bonds. There is a phrase in the amendment which would seem to imply that hereafter there may be some issued. I ask that the Secretary read it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment, as amended, will be again reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment as amended.

Mr. SHERMAN. That implies that these bonds may be issued hereafter. One clause prohibits it and another clause permits it, at least by construction.

Mr. DAWES. It so struck me when it was first read, but upon the second reading I think the reference is to certificates hereafter issued, and not to bonds hereafter issued. On the second reading, I am inclined to think my criticism was not correct; but I may be mistaken.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont, whose amendment to the amendment has just been adopted, whether he understands it to restrict the debt of this District to the existing amount to-day. I say this because I understand that $13,775,900 of 3.65 bonds were issued up to two days ago; and it was my desire that the issue should be restricted to that sum. I would propose, if it were in order, to amend by inserting this sum of $13,775,900. I shall seek to do that in the Senate; and yet if my object has been accomplished by the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate by offering an amendment in the Senate. I trust he understands me.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand the Senator from Delaware perfectly. The amendment which I have had the honor to propose, and which has been adopted by the Senate in committee, is not confined to these 3.65 bonds alone, or to these certificates; but it limits the total indebtedness of the District in all respects so as to have a maximum beyond which none of the officers of the District shall go; and if they have anything to do hereafter which requires the expenditure of money they must have the money to do it with and not increase the total amount of the debt of the District, whether it be done by issuing certificates or by borrowing money or incurring new liabilities in whatever form. So I think my amendment covers not only the point proposed by the Senator from Delaware but the broader one.

Mr. BAYARD. I submit to the honorable Senator from Vermont whether, as his amendment is now part of another amendment which contains the affirmative sum of fifteen millions, it may not be construed with relation to that. I do not desire the debt of this District in the shape of 3.65 bonds to be increased one dollar beyond that which it is to-day; but having in this amendment the sum stated of $15,000,000, I question whether it may not be construed with the Senator's amendment so that the $15,000,000 will be the maximum of the debt. I shall not be satisfied with that if I can prevent it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is perfectly easy to prevent it when we get into the Senate, by moving to strike out the fifteen million-dollar clause. Then it will all be open again, and we can strike out the $15,000,000. I do not think it would have that effect; but I am not only willing but desirous that we shall employ language that there will be no dispute about in stopping, so far as running in debt is concerned, where we are.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. HAMILTON] to the amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON. I propose my amendment to come in before the last amendment adopted, if I can have the privilege of placing it there. I call the attention of the Senate to the estimates made for the current year in the way of improvements. You will find them in Mr. Hoxie's report:

For repairing concrete pavement	$185,000
For repairing Pennsylvania avenue	286,000
For grading	102,000

In all conscience there has been grading enough done in the city of Washington in the last five years; but it seems to have been impossible to stop this work. The old board of public works increased the debt $8,000,000 beyond the amount authorized by law, and the present board of commissioners have added nearly as much to it, six and a half million of dollars in defiance of law. Now what is to prevent, in the course of next year, the commissioners adding another three or four millions in the way of improvements? As was remarked by the Senator from Iowa yesterday, the streets need improvements now as bad as they did in 1871, and much more than they did in 1873 and 1874; for there are miles and miles of pavement here that is rotten absolutely to-day; they might as well have been paved at the time with turnips or sweet-potatoes. Green timber, hemlock, the cheapest thing that could be bought in the market anywhere, was put in at enormous prices; and Congress does not feel itself obliged to do anything else than obey the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations; and that is all that we have to do—to vote money. It does not make any difference how it was expended, whether it was regular or irregular, or whether it was right or wrong, whether it is a violation of law or not; we are told it is a debt against the Government and must be paid!

Mr. President, I, for one, confess that I am completely muddled by the legal arguments which have been made all over the Chamber in support of the proposition to pay these $15,000,000 on the part of the United States, because I call it the payment of that much money ultimately. I do not think the District government can pay a cent of it, and I do not think it will ever pay a cent of it, and I do not think it ought to. The point I tried to make yesterday was that, so far as the certificates passed upon by the board of audit and redeemed by the commissioners of the sinking fund in bonds are concerned, there is a debt against the Government which nobody, I think, ought to try to evade. That much is settled, whether it was right or not. I think in 1874 it was very wrong to trust discretion in anybody to issue seven or eight or ten millions of dollars of questionable debt, and that it was questionable everybody knows.

In the first place the board of public works was required by the organic law to let out the paving by contract to the lowest bidder. They were not authorized at all to make private contracts for paving, and therefore all their contracts were null and void; they were without authority of law; and, inasmuch as they had exceeded by seven or eight millions of dollars the amount authorized by law, it was competent for the Government to look closely into those evidences of debt before the Government assumed anything.

If gentlemen will look carefully into the act of the 20th of June, 1874, authorizing the auditing of this debt, they will see that the auditors were required to send for persons and papers, to examine in the light of the report made by the joint committee of the two Houses, in the light of the law bearing on the subject, and to scrutinize everything; and the expectation was that the alleged debt would be cut down very largely. I thought so, I am sure. I thought a great deal of it was improper, and that the auditing board would find it to be improper. But, so far as I can ascertain, I do not see that the auditing board rejected anything. They have audited up to perhaps the full limit of the amount found to be outstanding by the joint committee, say, $8,300,000 or $8,400,000.

As I remarked just now, I want it understood that I do not deny the obligation resting upon the Government to pay the interest on so much of these 3.65 bonds as shall have been ascertained to be made up of the obligations contracted by the board of public works; but, as to what the District commissioners have added to that since, I think there is no authority in law for it. I think it was shown clearly by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] the other day and by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday that there was no foundation at all for the claim made on the part of the friends of the commissioners here that they were authorized to make those contracts.

Let us look at some of the contracts made. I have not the report at hand and it is not necessary to produce it, because the matter is within our memory. The report of the joint committee in 1874 stated that one single firm in the city of Chicago had obtained a contract here for 200,000 square yards of wood pavement for which they paid a bonus of $95,000. I hold that no gentleman in business anywhere would consider himself bound by the act of his agent who would make a contract of that sort. I am sure that if I had an agent who would involve me in a debt of thousands of dollars and I could find the facts which established so clearly a violation of all principles of justice and right in making the contracts, I should not hold myself responsible at all for the payment of such a debt.

It seems, according to the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] that all this trouble has grown out of the use of the word "or" in place of the word "and" somewhere in the statute of 1874, while the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] does not inquire into the thing at all, does not think it necessary to inquire, but presumes the expenditures were proper and very light comparatively for a grand city; that $15,000,000 is not anything! Several other Senators have fully justified everything that has been done.

The Senator from New York was very much exercised because somebody was threatening to give a black eye to these 3.65 bonds, and the Senator did me the honor to look very closely at me, as though I had struck the 3.65 bonds in the eye. Well, the Senator was so severe in his aspect that I began to look around for some place to crawl through the floor. I was alarmed a little. Nevertheless and notwithstanding all these quibbles—I call them quibbles—all this refining and splitting hairs by lawyers to justify this work, the plain common-sense people of the country begin to understand it. They understand that money has been expended here in violation of law, without any authority whatever; not only a few dollars, but millions of dollars. I will not go over all the ground which has been occupied by other Senators who have made close arguments upon the question, but, as it was suggested by the Senator from New Jersey that we all look at the thing as it is, I propose to state how it appears to me.

There are in this city some very remarkable men, I think men of very superior ability; men of great force of will; men of character—I mean character in the way of pushing their fortunes—men of boldness; men who are endowed with the capacity to control others, to convince others, to carry others with them. I do not know of such men anywhere else in America. And the trouble is that nobody that you have put in authority in this District during the last five years has been able to withstand the influence of these men. They have controlled the operations in this city, and they are controlling the operations in this city to-day just as absolutely as they did three years ago. I for one confess, and I put myself in the same category with the rest of the Senate, that I do not mean to charge dishonesty upon anybody, either upon gentlemen who live in the city, or upon the board of public works, or upon the present board of commissioners; I simply think they were so unfortunate that they met with men superior to themselves, and who controlled them; and I do not know but that the Senate of the United States is controlled in the same way to-day. Indeed, that is my impression.

Complaints were made here in 1872, loud and long complaints, by the citizens of the town. No attention was paid to them, or very little attention, by either branch of Congress. A little later those complaints grew louder and longer, until they began to reach all over the country. In the mean time the resources of the District government were exhausted. The placer had been worked out completely; the District had no credit; it had not a dollar in the treasury; and there were about six or seven million dollars of certificates floating over the country, hawked, pawned, soaked, as the saying is, from here to New York. The authors then of these grand improvements were at the end of their rope; they could not move a peg. Their friends—I happen to know something about this, because I heard it—were the leading men in the town to advocate a change in the government. Even Shepherd himself did not care anything about a government that could not support him. He was tired of the thing, and he undoubtedly would have resigned if you had left the affair as you found it in 1874. He would not continue to act as governor a day longer than he could raise revenue to defray the expenses of his government. These gentlemen, as everybody knows here I believe, had entered into pretty large purchases of real estate; had put up extensive improvements on that real estate, and gone largely into the building business. The panic of 1873 came on; and what did we find then? The sales of this property were stopped; it was all mortgaged nearly. These gentlemen were about to go to the wall and the property to be brought under the hammer. They sought then for some resource to lift them out of the bog, and the resource was to persuade Congress to abolish that government, because it had been extravagant, to appoint commissioners in bankruptcy to take charge of the effects and wind it up, as everybody here thought—I confess I thought that—and to do nothing more, except to take care that a man did not slip in a bog in the street; that they should mend a crack in a sewer, or do something of that sort to prevent things going to pieces. But the gentlemen in town that I spoke of had other views. They understood what they could make out of this thing, and they persuaded Congress to allow these claims to be re-audited in the light of all that had happened and been discovered, saying possibly they will be cut down very largely, possibly not; but at any rate you will get at what is correct against the Government, and assume to pay it in 3.65 bonds. That was authorized. Now what came after that? These District commissioners have gone on and let out, I guess, one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty contracts that were left over of the board of public works, and that were made in the first place in violation of law, and in the second place in the face of the inhibition of the law, being in excess of the $10,000,000 limitation. They have done this in the face of the act of June 20, 1874. Still, notwithstanding all these things, which one would suppose were enough to have cut them off, these District commissioners have gone on and spent about six and a half millions of dollars, as well as I can make out from their reports.

While speaking of their reports, I beg to say for myself that I have examined them with some care during the last month. I looked through them before this question came up, and I have not begun to understand them yet. It is like hunting for a grain of wheat in a bushel of chaff. You may find some things in them, but there is no recapitulation, there is nothing that stands out fairly which anybody can see at a glance, and I suppose that not one Senator in ten on this floor really understood anything about them at the time this debate sprang up. I understand enough about them now to see what the commissioners may do hereafter; and I say that nobody can be trusted here with any discretion. That is clear enough. We have had to provide over and over again. If there is any more work to be done in the way of paving miles of streets here, or of grading, or expensive work of that sort, Congress ought to say, as long as the Government is in the condition in which it is now, what streets should be improved and what streets should be made. Let the estimates be made, and then make the appropriation for the improvement, either to be paid out of the national Treasury or out of the treasury of the District, if it is able to pay it.

As the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] remarked yesterday, nearly all this pavement is rotting. There are probably sixty, or seventy, or eighty miles of pavement here that will scarcely bear up a wagon to-day; it is absolutely rotten. A million and a quarter of dollars and upward was voted out of the national Treasury in 1874, ostensibly to pay the poor workmen who had been employed on this public work. It was said that their case was a hard one; that some poor contractors, perhaps, had not been paid, and their case was a hard one; that there was no money in the District treasury, and therefore it was necessary to provide this money out of the national Treasury to pay these claims and to redeem some of these certificates which were hypothecated in New York, perhaps in Baltimore, and here in Washington. I was informed at the time, for I staid here two or three months after the passage of the act, that a very small portion, if any, of that $1,300,000 went into the hands of any poor laborers in this town, or even into the hands of contractors, except the wealthy ones; that the bulk of the certificates had passed into the hands of third persons before the act was passed; that while the bill was under consideration in the two Houses of Congress more than half a million of dollars was bought up in the streets of Washington at from forty to fifty cents on the dollar, and when the bill passed the assignees went to the Treasury and got the money. As the saying is, it helped these gentlemen "out of the woods." Hard times have continued, and real estate will not sell to-day; they are just as much in distress now as they were two years ago; and it is necessary for their salvation that these bonds shall be recognized by the Government. They are the parties deeply interested in the subject. The government of the District is in no distress; and I undertake to say that it will not injure the credit of the Government one single farthing if the interest on these bonds are not paid at all until the matter is investigated. If there was any way to distinguish between the bonds issued by the board of sinking-fund commissioners for claims arising before the 20th of June 1874, and those for claims made since, I should say in all reason, go on and pay the interest on the original bonds; that would be to the extent probably of $8,500,000. But you cannot distinguish between those bonds. So far as I can ascertain, the District commissioners went along in June, 1874, as soon as they took possession of the government, and let out contracts, had these claims audited by the sinking-fund commissioners, and the parties got the bonds; and probably any number have grown out of the work done in 1874. They are all mixed up; it is impossible to divide them. They are in the same category precisely that Mr. Magruder's accounts were. He had issued certificates, paid out certificates, and paid out money; he had them all mixed up together in his books, and said himself he could not tell how much money he had paid to any one man and how much in certificates. When the money was at par and the certificates at about fifty cents on the dollar, it was all mixed up together; they did not keep any account of the funds at all; and no separate account has been kept in regard to these bonds. It would be eminently proper, I think, for the bonds to be overhauled, just as a merchant would take out a rotten bale of cotton when it comes into market. If unfit for market it is sent to the packery, and taken loose and picked, every tainted lock is picked out, and then it is put into the market and sold as clean cotton.

I do not attribute any wrong to Governor Shepherd for what he is doing now. I believe he is the master-spirit around about here. He is an eloquent man, a man of strong will. He does not hold any position under the Government, but is a private citizen; and if he can persuade these District commissioners and the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives to accommodate him with money out of the public Treasury, I do not blame him. I understand he is now, and has been for the last twelve months, selling houses at very high prices, principally to contractors. I am told that they are his best customers and have bought very largely of his fine houses here. How? I know myself that he always had houses for sale. It is said that when he comes across a man who wants a fine mansion he says to him: "I have a house to sell and you may have it for $15,000," or "$20,000," as the case may be. The other party says: "I have not got the money; I would like to have a good residence, but I cannot pay for it." Says he: "There is some work to be done here in this city of Washington; the board of commissioners has authority under the law to let out contracts, and here are contracts made by the board of public works to be extended. You can get a contract. I will do what I can to secure it for you." It turns out in the end that the man gets a contract. He finds a little contract, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] remarked the other day, up here on Capitol Hill somewhere for a single block about three hundred or four hundred feet long, and on that hook the District commissioners have hung probably a mile and a half of streets scattered all over the city of Washington, and found squares and alleys to be paved. The man takes that contract, amounting to $200,000 probably, the profits on which will be at least $65,000 or $70,000 net, and the man is able to pay for his house and pocket a good sum besides. That that sort of work has been done very largely here I do not think anybody will dispute. As I said before, I do not impute any crime to anybody. These District commissioners doubtless (they say so at any rate) thought they were authorized to let out these contracts. I do not think so. A good many Senators here think there is no doubt they had such authority. It is clear as anything to my mind that they had no such authority. Still they had discretion, and they exercised that discretion, and Shepherd has been able to persuade them to exercise it. That that has been done I think there is no question in the world.

I have felt disinclined to say anything on this subject, but the arguments made by several Senators struck me as so novel that I wondered that I had any sense at all. I began to conclude that I could not see anything anywhere; but I do not see any other way of stopping the piling up of this debt except by a provision such as I have offered. The amendments which other Senators have proposed and which have been adopted are not going to stop the work, I can see. You will save the issue of more bonds and probably of certificates. You say the debt shall not exceed so much. That has been said three or four times before. You said it should not exceed $10,000,000 under any circumstances, but they did exceed it. In 1874 you said this is winding up this thing, this is the end of it; as the common phrase is, "the thing is played out," it cannot go any further; but it has gone on just as bad as before. The District commissioners have issued nearly as much as the board of public works in excess of the law, more in fact, in proportion to the time they have been in service, because they have been here but a little over a year and a half, and they have run up between six and seven million dollars. The board of public works were in office three years, and they only exceeded the amount authorized by law by a little over $8,000,000. If my amendment is adopted, I think it will be impossible, without an act of Congress, to pave a street in the city of Washington; it will be impossible to grade a street, and that is what I want. I hope the Senate will adopt the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I hope the Senate now is in a condition to vote upon the proposition before it. It seems to me the Senate must be sick of this whole thing by this time, and I hope my honorable friend from Texas, in the present attitude of affairs, will not think it important to urge the passage of his amendment. As the matter now stands, on the propositions already adopted by the Senate, no more bonds can be issued. That is the first proposition. In the second place, the debt is limited to $15,000,000, and that, as is shown by the statement of the commissioners, is within the limit of all the issues of the bonds and the certificates, and the probable expenditures under the old contracts.

The three propositions then are that no more bonds are to be issued; that the debt in no case shall exceed $15,000,000; and by the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont the present aggregate amount of indebtedness shall not be increased. Now I submit to my honorable friend from Texas that putting those three things together makes it an economical impossibility for these commissioners to involve the District in $1 of addititional indebtedness. It may be said that this phraseology is a little vague, as I think it is myself. Take the proposition of the Senator from Vermont that the present amount of the indebtedness of the District shall not be increased. That applies to these commissioners and to everybody else. The only question would be as to what the indebtedness is. I have suggested to the Senator from Vermont that that might be an embarrassment, but he prefers that it should remain as it is, and I am not going to antagonize that. It might lead to embarrassment in this: An indebtedness would not necessarily, perhaps not properly, include an obligation; and it may be the purpose of the Senator that it shall not extend to an obligation. Under the act of 1874 these commissioners were authorized to spend money to carry out the obligations supposed to have been incurred by contracts made by the old board of public works. I suggest that, if this stands as it is, it will confine it to debts by declaring that the debt of the District shall not be increased. Of course that necessarily cuts off all contracts of every description which these commissioners might be disposed to enter into hereafter. The proposition of the Senator from Vermont, now adopted by the Senate, it seems to me is absolutely conclusive upon any increase of indebtedness by these commissioners or by anybody else in any direction. Therefore I submit to my friend from Texas whether there is any object in pressing his amendment. It is simply piling up in the same direction and adds nothing at all to the security of the Treasury of the United States or the treasury of the District government against further indebtedness.

But there is one other argument which I desire to address to the sense of the Senator, and that is this: If his amendment prevails it will be impossible for them to spend $1 for the improvement of these streets.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the Senator will allow me, that is not the intention.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If the Senator will permit me to go on, he will see whether it is so or not. My first proposition is that the door is closed already by the three distinct propositions contained in the three respective amendments already made. There will be no such thing as increasing this debt any further; there is no authority for doing it. The proposition of the Senator from Texas is that the paving and grading of the streets and alleys be discontinued until authorized by law. Let us see what these commissioners may do and clearly what they ought to do and certainly what they ought not to be restrained from doing. Under the act of 1874 these commissioners were authorized and have power to apply the taxes or other revenues of the District to the payment of the current expenses thereof. Then it goes on to mention certain things. Of course the repair of streets is among the current expenses. How do you repair these streets? By repaving. So far as the question of grading is concerned, that is another part of speech. Take Pennsylvania avenue. It is impassable to-day; and so of many other streets. My honorable friend does not intend, I take it, to go so far as to say that the authority of these commissioners to pave these streets in the way of repairing them should be suspended.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the Senator will allow me I will suggest to him that it is competent for Congress to authorize the paving of a street when it is necessary to be paved. I made the point just now that I did not think, in the light of what we have seen here during the last eighteen months, anybody could be trusted with discretion at all. We authorized them to repair the streets and to save property upon which a great deal of money had been expended, and on that very thing they have expended six million dollars and a half.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then, if I understand the honorable Senator, his purpose is to say that the authority of these commissioners to improve these streets and keep them in repair should be entirely suspended.

Mr. HAMILTON. I think so.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Is the Senate willing to do that? I should think it a most extraordinary proposition. I will not characterize the proposition, but I think it would be a most extraordinary conclusion to come to that the Congress of the United States, having suspended the government in the District of Columbia and having delayed these two years the substitution of any government for this condition of things, were now disposed to say to these commissioners, the streets and the avenues of this city being in such a condition as they evidently now are, there shall be no power and no authority to spend the revenues, the taxes which have been gathered from the people themselves, in the improvement of the streets. It may be the Senate are disposed to do that thing, but I doubt it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not know that I would have participated in this debate if the line of the debate had been properly confined to the consideration of the question whether we should authorize the commissioners to transfer from the treasury of the District a sufficient amount of money to pay the interest upon the 3.65 bonds issued under authority of Congress. That was the question which was raised by the resolution under consideration; but the debate has taken a very wide range and an innumerable number of subjects have been discussed in considering it. I am free to say that the measure itself was not free from embarrassment. Whenever it is proposed to increase the public debt of this country already, with more than $2,000,000 in bonds, it is a subject that ought not lightly to be considered by the Congress of the United States.

In the discussion of this question criticism has been indulged not only upon the action of the board of commissioners of this District, but also upon the committee which investigated two years ago into the condition of affairs in this District and which reported the law under which this commission exists. That the action of the board of commissioners is not free from criticism I think is very apparent after this discussion has taken place. I have heard it asserted, and I have no reason to doubt, that the commission is composed of gentlemen of high character. I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with any of the commission, but I can readily understand the embarrassment which surrounded those commissioners when they entered upon the discharge of the duties imposed upon them by the act of Congress creating that commission. They were the successors of the board of public works of this District. As the successors of the board of public works their duties were such as to require of them great care, great caution, or otherwise they must necessarily make very grave mistakes. This entire city had been for two or three years preceding their appointment in the hands of a class of men who had undertaken virtually the remodeling of this entire city. An amount of excavations and embankment had been commenced that perhaps never was equaled in any single city in any part of the world. The entire grade of the city had been altered, involving the necessity of a different mode of sewerage. When these commissioners came into office they found this city literally a city of ditches in many portions of it. They were instructed under the act which created them to preserve the works which had been commenced, and I can very readily see that when they came to look into the law which conferred upon them their authority and power they might make very grave mistakes without any corruption on their part or without any intention to exceed the authority invested in them by the act of Congress.

That such mistakes have been made I do not question. I have no doubt that by reason of such mistakes the public debt of this city has been largely increased. The question now addresses itself to us whether we shall in any form approve of or ratify the action of the board of commissioners by providing for the payment of the interest upon the bonds which have been issued to meet the liabilities which they in part have incurred. I think myself that there was not sufficient care in the framing of the law under which they were authorized to issue bonds to guard and protect against a large increase of the public debt of this District. I think that we made a mistake in not limiting at the time of the passage of the law in 1874 in express terms the amount of bonds which should be issued. It is very apparent that the committee which reported that law believed that it contained such clear intimations that the commissioners would not depart from it, and that there would in all probability not be issued under its provisions 3.65 bonds in excess at any rate of more than $12,000,000. Yet we find the bonded debt of 3.65 bonds has now been run up to nearly $15,000,000.

The question is, shall we provide now for the payment of that interest by directing the commissioners to transfer to the Treasury of the United States any moneys under their control for the purpose of meeting that interest? That is the question which addresses itself to us. I confess I feel some embarrassment in voting upon that proposition, because in doing so I may by my vote direct the payment of the interest upon bonds which, if properly inquired into, would be found to be issued illegally and without authority. I do not think the matter has passed beyond the control of Congress. We may inquire into the legality of the issue of these bonds, and whether the present holders obtained them in settlement of illegal contracts, and if so, whether they do not hold them subject to all equities. I recognize clearly the obligation of the Government to provide for the payment of the interest upon every bond which has been properly and legitimately issued. Therefore I feel embarrassed in voting upon this proposition, because I do not wish to avoid the proper responsibilities which attach to the Government of the United States, nor do I wish by any vote of mine to sanction the issue of a bond which has not been issued in conformity with the requirements of law. I have no such tender sympathies for the holders of these bonds that I would not inquire into the validity of the bonds, and would not ascertain precisely the title of the bondholder to the bond which has been issued and deliverable to him, and if I found that any contractor had received this bond for the execution of any illegal contract made by the board of public works I would not hesitate at once to say that he took that bond subject to all the equities in the case.

As I have before said, this board of commissioners had great embarrassments surrounding them. The board of public works had made large contracts, many of which were outstanding and unexecuted. Many of the contracts had been executed, and no provision for their payment had been made by the board of public works; and a very large amount of certificates of indebtedness had been issued and were in the hands of contractors, or had been transferred by them to other holders. I have no question that if properly investigated many of those certificates would be found to have been not properly delivered by the board of public works. We appointed a board of audit, and that board of audit examined the claims presented and passed upon them, and delivered certificates according to the audits made. In my opinion it was utterly impossible that the board should not deliver some of those certificats to men whose contracts were fraudulent and without authority of law. Their authority was not to pass upon the legality of contracts, but of claims under contracts made by the board of public works. That the board of audit designed to act properly I have no question. I have no doubt but that all of those gentlemen, the board of audit, the funding commissioners, and the commissioners of the District are honest men, but they have been imposed upon in my opinion in many instances. To provide now for the payment of the interest of these bonds becomes a ratification to a certain extent by Congress of everything that has been done by these boards. It is for that reason that I say I feel some embarrassment in voting upon the plain provisions of this bill. Looking at it, however, in all its bearings, seeing that Congress authorized these various boards, the board of audit and the board of commissioners, and conferred upon them authority to issue bonds, I do not see any other way out of the dilemma than by maintaining what I conceive to be the honor of the Government, by providing for the payment of the interest of these bonds. If there were some way to investigate and to ascertain which of these bonds had been properly and legally delivered and issued, and the precise bonds which had been illegally issued, issued in the payment of illegal contracts, or illegal certificates given on account of illegal contracts, I do not hesitate to say that I, for one, would take my stand and refuse to provide for the interest upon these bonds until there had been a thorough investigation of them, and then only for such as had been properly issued.

I am not here to arraign the board of public works. In the discussion yesterday the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] entered into a lengthy defense of the board of public works. Whatever glory may attach to the Senator from California for such defense I cheerfully concede. In my opinion the action of the board of public works has not only been condemned by the action of this Senate in destroying that board, but its condemnation has been ratified by the people of this entire country, and no effort of the Senator from California or of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] or any other Senator on this floor can bring back respectability even to its memory.

The board of public works has inflicted upon this District a burden greater than has been inflicted upon the people of almost any city in the world.

Within a few years there has been an expenditure in this District in the neighborhood of $30,000,000, and perhaps more than that. I am told that the public debt of this city at the present time is about $23,000,000. Such was the assertion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yesterday. In addition to that, millions of dollars have been abstracted in money by taxation from the property-holders in this District and expended by this board of public works. Besides that, there have been large appropriations made by Congress in money expended under the direction of that board of public works and what have we in return? About a hundred miles of streets, concrete and wood-paved streets; and what is the condition now of the improvements which have been made? Just look at Pennsylvania avenue. We all see it daily. That job, for I call it a job, that improvement, which cost a large amount of money, to-day is in a condition that it is scarcely safe for vehicles; and I say here that I would rather have a common dirt road to drive upon than to drive upon Pennsylvania avenue in its present condition. The board of commissioners themselves in their estimates of expenditures for the present year estimate that it will cost $286,000 to repair Pennsylvania avenue. According to the reports of these commissioners the sewers contracted for and paid for under the direction of the board of public works are in such a condition that it will require in the present year an expenditure of thousands of dollars. They have already required thousands of dollars to keep them in proper working order to run off the drainage. Go into whatever part of the city you may, you will find the work done by this board of public works and by contracts made under them, improvements which were carried on under their direction, in such a dilapidated condition that it will be necessary within a few years to remove the whole of them.

This is the consideration which we have had for these $30,000,000 that have been expended since, say, 1871. That wrong has been inflicted not only upon the people of this District who have been largely taxed, but has also been inflicted upon the people of the whole country, whose money taken out of the public Treasury has been drawn upon, and which in the future must be drawn much more largely upon, to pay this debt created by these gentlemen cannot be denied nor can it be excused.

If the Senator from California can make any capital for his party, or if any glory will descend upon him in becoming the especial defender of the board of public works, I certainly do not envy him his laurels. It was this board of public works, the former government of this city, that has laid the foundation for the large expenditures which have been made in the last year by the board of commissioners. They found themselves in such a condition that to carry out the provisions of the act of Congress which created the present board of commissioners it was necessary that they should expend large amounts of money in order to preserve and protect the works which had already been commenced by their predecessors. They found themselves embarrassed by what had been done, and in order to carry it out and to preserve the works, the sewerage system and the streets that had been commenced, they were compelled to spend a large amount of money. They not only found these works commenced, but they found hundreds and thousands of persons who had been employed, who had performed labor and carried out contracts under the board of public works, unpaid. In passing down Pennsylvania avenue we all remember there were thousands of men congregated daily for months near Four-and-a-half street, waiting anxiously for the pay which was denied them for work which they had performed under the board of public works. Congress, in its humanity, in order to relieve the necessities of these laboring people, actually put their hands into the public Treasury and paid the debts which this board of public works ought to have paid or ought never to have contracted to pay.

I do not wish to say personally anything about gentlemen, whether they belong to the board of public works or not. It is no part of my duty at the present time, because that board of public works has passed out of existence, and yet, when I remember the great injustice that was done to the people of this District by that board, when I remember the great wrong that has been done to the people of the country by permitting the creation of a debt under their auspices amounting to some $23,000,000, I feel a degree of indignation that will justify me in saying that they were instead of a public blessing to this city and this District, as they claimed to be, they were a curse to the District and a curse to the country. Some of them have grown rich; I shall not attempt to say whether honestly or dishonestly, but some of the people of this District have grown poor. While the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] yesterday was speaking of the great improvements in this city, and, according to my remembrance, intimated that nobody would restore the old order of things, I thought the humble poor man whose home had been sold to pay the taxes imposed by the board of public works perhaps would not respond to the sentiment uttered by the Senator from California.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator if he does not know it as a fact that to the very extremities of the city the home of the poor man as well as of the rich rose vastly in value, so that lands which before that time were worth but from seven to twenty-five cents a square foot rose to from one dollar to two dollars and a half, lifting up the whole value of property in the District?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Unfortunately it is not the poor man that owns real estate as a general rule. The Senator from California knows that not only in this District but throughout this entire country real estate is in the hands of too few men. But if there was a poor man who owned a cottage in the suburbs of this city, and it is true that there has been some enhancement in the value of his little home, is it not equally true that the burdens which have been imposed upon him by increased taxation have rendered that home uncomfortable? Does not the Senator from California know that there have been sales of real estate for the purpose of paying taxes, the property of persons who were unable to pay the taxes imposed by this board of public works? Why, sir, the report of these commissioners shows that there is litigation now pending in the courts to prevent threatened sales of real estate for the payment of taxes and to prevent the confirmation of sales already made. I think that is the case.

No, sir, it has not been in the interest of the poor man, but, as was said yesterday, I fear that it has been in the interest of the men belonging to the pool, that these streets have been extended for miles into the suburbs of the city. Why is it that palaces are rearing in these suburbs? Ah, sir, when you find that away out on the suburbs of this city some nabob, some man of wealth, has made large purchases, and erected large palaces, then you understand the reason these improvements have been extended to that extent. It was not for the benefit of the tenant of the humble cottage, but it was in order that some such man's property might be enhanced. That, in my judgment, was the secret of this wide extension. Before some of the streets of this city are built up that have cost thousands and hundreds of thousands of dollars, the streets themselves will be dilapidated, and will require repairing. But some fortunate speculator had bought a property away out on Connecticut avenue, or in some other part of this city, and forthwith the board of public works pushes the improvements in that direction. The consequence has been, that now we have a District debt of about $23,000,000, according to the Senator from Iowa yesterday, besides the vast expenditures of money obtained from taxation upon the taxables of this District, and from appropriations made by Congress.

Now, whatever may be proper to be done in reference to this bill, I hope that it will not be passed until there is some limitation upon the amount of indebtedness that shall obtain in this District and some limitation upon the amount of work that shall be done. Why, take up the estimates for the present year by the board of commissioners and see. I have before me the estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876. Look at them: For sweeping streets, $25,000 for this year and $60,000 for next year; sweeping alleys, $4,000 for the present fiscal year and $12,000 for the next fiscal year. These are the estimates of this board of what it will be necessary to expend. For repairs of concrete pavement, $36,000 for the present fiscal year and $64,000 for the next fiscal year. Repair of wood pavements, $185,000 for the present fiscal year and $309,000 for the next fiscal year.

And so these expenses are to go on ad infinitum, involving the necessity of an expenditure of millions of dollars to run a single city, unless there is some limitation placed upon the power of the commissioners, or of those exercising authority under the act of Congress, to incur expenditures.

I approved of and voted for the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, to limit the amount of indebtedness, both bonded and certificate indebtedness, and to provide that no further indebtedness shall be created; but I want something further than that. I want some authority somewhere placed in the law that shall restrict the authority of these commissioners to do anything which is not absolutely and positively necessary and indispensable. I do not care about having these streets swept three times a day, if is to cost $60,000. Let us put up with sweeping the streets less frequently. I do not care about having everything made in the best order, and kept, as we sometimes say, in apple-pie order. Provided we can limit the expenses of the city, I am willing to see this city, not the great metropolis spoken of the other day by the Senator from New Jersey, but let us keep it a respectable city, worthy to be the metropolis and, only worthy to be the metropolis, of a plain republic, and not such as becomes the abode of monarchy and aristocracy.

Mr. President, I hope that there will be some limitation upon the authority of these commissioners to expend money. The amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont limits the amount of indebtedness, but, as I understand it, it does not limit the amount of expenditures; these commissioners, therefore, may go on and do whatsoever they think proper, and call upon Congress hereafter to furnish the money or impose taxation upon the people of this District to raise the money. Let us limit their authority to expend money. I hope that will be done.

I have already, Mr. President, spoken much longer upon this subject than I intended. In fact, I did not propose until a few minutes ago to enter into the discussion at all, but it has become a matter of such interest to the people of the country, when the expenses of the city are being constantly increased and the indebtedness of the country on account of the expenses in the city are being constantly increased, that I have been disposed for one to raise my voice in favor of some limitation upon the expenditure of money on this capital.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I hope the Senate will not be uneasy at seeing me get up at so late an hour. I do not intend to make a speech, but the subject has been discussed at such length by Senators that really, although I thought I understood it at first, I must candidly say that I do not now. After all this discussion I rise for information. I wish to know, and I would ask the Senator from Maine, who is so full of information on all subjects, to let me know who now is authorized to issue any evidence of debt, either in the shape of a certificate or a bond which is binding upon us. I see an effort made here by different Senators—and the amendment of the Senator from Vermont looks to me in that direction, and that of the Senator from Texas also—to arrest the power which is assumed to exist somewhere to create an additional debt binding upon us. Now, sir, I should like to know in all candor who is authorized to make that debt. In reading back the first law passed on this subject, I observe that there was a board created called the board of audit. That board was authorized to audit—we know the meaning of the word—certain classifications of claims. The time was limited to ninety days, was it not?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Originally.

Mr. BOGY. Originally it was limited to ninety days. It was extended time and again. The last extension was passed on the 3d of March, 1875, and the time was extended to the 1st of July, 1875. Now, since the 1st of July, 1875, who is authorized to issue a certificate which is binding upon us? Who is authorized to issue a bond which is binding upon us? I should like to know.

As I understand the law of June 20, 1874, with all its amendments, we did authorize, wisely or unwisely, a certain board, called the board of audit, to allow certain characters of claims against this Government and to issue a certain class of bonds which we call the 3.65 bonds. There was no limit, unwisely. It was supposed at the time they could not exceed $8,000,000, from what has been stated around me; but yet there was no limit in the law, and it is said, and I believe said with great truth, that the board was extravagant and allowed claims to the amount of thirteen millions and some hundreds of thousands of dollars. And yet the power did exist in that board to allow those claims; but the power does not exist now. It may be true that the board has the power to issue a bond for a claim which has heretofore been passed and has been changed from an open account into a certificate of allowance. That may or may not be true; but certain it is that, since the 1st of July, 1875, this board, as regards this power of auditing, is functus officio. Is it not? If the Senator from Maine will reply to this, I shall be under great obligations to him, as I have been often before.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will read the statute of December 21, 1874.

Mr. BOGY. That is a joint resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir.

That the board of audit constituted by section 6 of the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, be continued until otherwise provided by law with all the powers and duties specified in said section, and with compensation to the members of the board at a rate proportioned, according to time, to that granted in said act, and payable as therein provided.

Mr. BOGY. But pardon me; go on.

And the time for presenting claims is hereby extended for the period of thirty days from this date.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That time has been by a subsequent act extended.

Mr. BOGY. I grant that. We will go on step by step to the act of March 3, 1875. I take it—and if I am mistaken I desire it to be corrected—that the act of March 3, 1875, is the last act on the subject, an act which ought not to have been passed, but which was passed without one single vote in opposition to it, for I have referred to the RECORD; an act reported by my friend the Senator from Maine. I find it in the Statutes at Large, page 509, and I will read it:

That the board of audit constituted by the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, may receive, audit, and allow just claims against said District of the first and second classes mentioned in the sixth section of said act, and claims for refunding sewer taxes, notwithstanding the limit of time for presentation contained in said act, and in the joint resolution—to continue said board of audit, approved December 21, 1874: Provided, That such claims shall be presented prior to the 1st day of July next.

That law was passed March 3, 1875; and now I will ask the Senator from Ohio if there was any law subsequent to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I know nothing about it.

Mr. BOGY. I ask the question in all candor. I put it to the Senator from Maine. If this be the last law, I ask the plain, commonsense question, who in the world has the power this day to issue any evidence of debt which is binding upon us?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will state to the Senator what my understanding is. That applies solely to the obligations and contracts of the old board of public works; so far as the presentation of claims growing out of those is concerned, there is a limitation; but, so far as expenditures are concerned made by the present commissioners under the authority given them, I do not understand that there is a limitation; and therefore, as to the latter classes of claims, there may be an indebtedness created since the time fixed.

Mr. BOGY. My reply to my friend from Maine is simply this: I have listened to the argument made by different Senators on this subject. To me, to use courteous language, it is the baldest construction I have ever seen or heard, to attempt to construe a power from the first section of the act of 1874, as in the most remote manner bearing upon the board of audit. The board of audit is created by the sixth section of that original law, and before the sixth section is put down in that law there is no provision in the wide world for such a thing as a board of audit in relation to the District of Columbia; and if that section had not been made the law that board never could have existed. Then you must go to that section for the meaning of the very law that breathed life into that concern. What does it say? The seventh section says it shall have a right to audit the claims enumerated in the preceding section; that is, the sixth section. I want to be direct and plain. The sixth section creates a board of audit, enumerates its powers. The seventh section authorizes it to issue certificates; and it says those certificates shall be used for nothing else but those claims that are enumerated in the sixth section, and the claims enumerated in the sixth section are not now in existence and cannot be; and I say, as a matter of law, that since the 1st day of July, 1875, no board of audit, commissioner, mayor, or other person had any right to issue any paper whatsoever, call it a certificate or call it a bond, which is binding upon us; and since the 1st day of July that board has been as dead as death can be. It has no power on earth; and I would suggest that we investigate and find out what that board has done since that time. I say it has no power more than I have individually to bind Congress. The very last act that extended it expired on the 1st day of July last; and this strange construction put upon that act by gentlemen here cannot be sustained; it is impossible.

I am unwilling to do anything by which honest contractors may by possibility be deprived of converting their certificates into bonds, for the simple reason that the honest contractor is not as sharp as the dishonest speculator. There may be honest men who have taken their certificates and have kept those certificates in good faith; but whenever a man bought such a certificate he at once had it converted into a bond. I would do nothing to prevent that class of people who honestly got their certificates getting their pay, if I can reach it in any fair way.

But I come back to the question I put to my friend from Maine, who is remarkably well versed in regard to all the affairs of the District of Columbia. I have a right to say so, because he once produced here before us the most appalling thing I ever saw in my life, dreadful to look at and horrible to hear, in relation to that subject; and I give him credit for great industry, provided he did that work himself. But he, with all his knowledge on this subject, admits that there is no law since the act of March 3, 1875; but he goes back to the first law, that of June 20, 1874, and the first section of that law, which section only enabled the board then created to expend the revenues and the taxes, and nothing more. It never was contemplated; and no court on earth would sustain the construction that has been placed upon it here by gentlemen. I have listened to the argument of my friend from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] who is always remarkably able, although on the wrong side, as he is generally. [Laughter.] He has that remarkable ability which can "make the worse appear the better reason." I always listen to his arguments as a matter of pleasure, to see how an ingenious man can make things appear right which in their nature are wrong. He argued the other day that it would be a very hard case if a street was partly completed not to complete that street; and so it would be; but this is all aside of the subject. We are attempting to stop this thing. I wish it stopped in a fair and enlightened and broad spirit. I feel a pride in the city of Washington, I like to see it prosper. I am glad to see its broad streets well paved and in good condition; but I want all that to be done with some degree of moderate honesty, not perfect, because we must not look for it, but some little degree of honesty.

Now, Mr. President, I will stop my speech—I promised you when I started out that I would not annoy you long—with inquiring again who has the power to run this city in debt since the 1st day of July, 1875; who has the power to issue a bond that is binding; who has the power to issue a certificate that is binding upon us? I say there is no board of audit or board of commissioners having any such power. I deny it entirely.

Mr. STEVENSON. I want to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A further amendment is not now in order. There is an amendment to an amendment already pending. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Let that amendment be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment to the amendment is to add—

And provided further, That the paving and grading of streets and alleys be discontinued until authorized by law.

Mr. SARGENT. I only want to say a word. I would like to inquire of the good sense of the Senate whether the effect of that amendment would not be to prevent any repairs of streets at all. If there should come a storm in the city and sink three or four sidewalks, or anything of that kind, would not all power be taken away, and if this happened during the recess of Congress the power could not be supplied at once? It is too sweeping entirely. I object to the amendment for that reason.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senate ought not to adopt this amendment, allow me to say. It would stop all repairs of every description; and that is what the mover of the amendment tells me he desires to do. I cannot conceive that the Senate really desire to say that the commissioners of the District of Columbia shall have no power to make any necessary improvements on these streets.

Now, on the point raised by my honorable friend from Missouri, [Mr. BOGY,] if there be any question about the power of this board of audit to issue more, that can easily be provided for. They cannot run us in debt any further. But on the question of making current expenditures, the Senate really does not intend to say that these commissioners in improving the streets and doing other ordinary service shall not have the power to expend the revenues in their hands. Beyond that of course there is no power to go. I hope therefore that the amendment will not be accepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. CLAYTON. I should like to have the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order while the vote is being taken.

Mr. CLAYTON. Then I desire to change my vote, [having first voted "nay."],

The result was announced—yeas 31, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Oglesby, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, English, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Conkling, Harvey, Howe, Jones of Nevada, Randolph, and Thurman,—10.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding after "District of Columbia," in the clause that was inserted on my motion, these words, which are designed merely to impose a penalty upon any officer or person who shall violate the prohibition against increasing the total indebtedness of the District:

And any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT. I was about to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the language of his amendment. I have an impression that it does not accomplish the purpose he aims at. As I understand the amendment, it punishes any person if he shall assist or abet in increasing the total indebtedness even under the maximum amount.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, Mr. President. It is "such total indebtedness." If the Secretary will be kind enough to read the clause already inserted limiting the total indebtedness, and then this clause which we have added to it, my friend will see that the present total amount shall not be increased, and any person who knowingly undertakes to increase it shall be subject to the penalties of the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. It may be that I am mistaken. Will the Secretary be good enough to read it again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clause will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The clause to which——

Mr. STEVENSON. Has not the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont been adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been adopted.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is it now in order to offer another amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Secretary will be allowed to read the clause in connection, because if there is any error about it I will move to reconsider that it may be made right; but I think it is right now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reporting the amendment just adopted in connection with the preceding clause? The Chair hears none.

The CHIEF CLERK. In connection with the following clause—

And there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia—

These words were added:

And any officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest that in order to make that a criminal offense it should be done knowingly and fraudulently. Unless a fraudulent purpose is connected with it, it seems to me it should not be a criminal offense. There might be a mistake of the law. I think all statutes of that kind use that word.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say just one thing more. It may be that this amendment, in connection with what precedes it, may be precisely as the Senator from Vermont contemplates; but I have very great fear that he will find, if the courts should come to construe it, inasmuch as the construction of course would be most liberal in favor of the person charged, that the construction would be different from what he contemplates by his amendment. But of course, as he has explained it and understands it and has drawn it, I shall not make objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. When the bill comes into the Senate, if my friend, having examined the clause and run his eye over it, can suggest any improvement by which we shall denounce the penalty of the law with certainty upon a violation of what we now say shall not be done, as it has been violated hitherto, I shall be most happy to have anything added or changed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. STEVENSON.]

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert at the end of the amendment the following:

Provided, That the board of audit created by the "act for the government of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall, immediately upon the approval of this act, transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and shall make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made.

Mr. STEVENSON. I agree with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] that this board of audit had no authority after 1st July, 1875, to audit or allow any just claims against the District of the first and second classes mentioned in the sixth section of the act approved June 20, 1874, nor to allow claims for refunding sewer taxes. The act of March 3, 1875, limited the presentation of all such claims to March 3, 1875. If this board of audit have allowed claims to be presented after the period last named they have exceeded their authority. All such claims presented and audited after July 1, 1875, are null and void, whether they are in certificates or in 3.65 bonds. I would be glad if the Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] would inform the Senate if any of these bonds were issued upon claims filed and audited by the board after July 1, 1875.

It occurs to me, Mr. President, that we are acting in the dark. We have no sufficient information as to how many of these fifteen million bonds are valid and how many are invalid. Here is a board of audit, which has no power to receive claims after July 1, 1875—which, after that period, so far as the reception of new claims was functus officio—still going on, in despite of the limitation imposed by the act approved March 3, 1875, and no Senator can say—nor is there any information on which a rational opinion can be based—how many of the bonds the interest of which are to be provided for by this bill were issued on claims presented after the 1st of July, 1875, or on claims presented before. If, as has been stated, the audit board have allowed claims to be presented after July 1, 1875, they have violated their duty, and all such claims and bonds issued in lieu of them are null and void.

I have no information of the actings and doings of this board of audit. I hear it stated in this debate, and not denied, that they have audited the counsel fees of the old board in defending themselves against the charges before the committee of investigation. If they have done so then it was a clear violation of law. They possessed no valid authority, as I think, to audit any such claims. This board of audit was created by the sixth section of the act approved June 20, 1874.

That act, as I construe it, applies only to contracts prior to its enactment. Its clear intendment was to clothe the board of audit which it created with power to pass upon claims already contracted, to liquidate obligations arising upon valid contracts already in existence and entered into by the board of public works, and such others specified in the act. One of the direct limitations of the act was its application and exclusive reference to claims existing prior to its enactment. By what claim of authority did the board of audit proceed to audit claims arising long subsequent to that act? What line or word in the statute creating this board of audit justifies their allowance of counsel fees for defending the old board of public works? And with what semblance of authority can that board receive and audit claims after the 1st of July, 1875?

Mr. President, I am dumbfounded at the developments of the irregularity which has marked the increase of this gigantic debt. Nobody seems to understand it. Senators say we must meet the interest of these bonds and inquire into their validity hereafter. They insist that these bonds are valid in the hands of innocent holders, although issued in direct violation of law. I deny that as a proposition of law. I insist that every purchaser of a negotiable security is bound to look to the authority of law under which it is issued as well to the face of the bond itself. Both put him on his guard. If either show a want of authority to issue the security or a want of title in the party selling them, I insist that the bond is void, even in the hands of an innocent holder for value. Such is the doctrine established, as I think, by a long series of well-considered opinions both in the Supreme Court of the United States and in the State courts. I know the legal ability by which I am surrounded, but I do not think I am mistaken in my statement of the law.

Take the ordinary case of railroad bonds issued by counties or cities for subscription to stock in railroads. Did the county or municipality have power to subscribe stock and issue its bonds? Were such bonds issued and sold and the stock issued? If so, the bonds are valid, even though certain other requisitions, such as popular votes by the county or city, were not complied with. But if the act under which the bonds were issued did not authorize their issue or did not empower the county or municipality to subscribe the stock, then I insist, upon principle and authority, that the bonds are void in the hands of innocent purchasers for value.

It does not therefore follow that all these 3.65 bonds are valid. The solution of that question depends on evidence not before us. Let me illustrate: Suppose a claimant obtained a certificate from this auditing board issued on a claim filed after their term of office had expired, say 1st of July, 1875, and had exchanged for a 3.65 bond; is it valid in the hands of any one who had notice of the facts? Must not every purchaser of such bond look to the law under which it is issued? Can it be claimed that the United States is bound for any bond issued in palpable violation of law? Now, until there has been an investigation of the facts under which these bonds were issued and the law has been judicially construed which it is claimed authorized their issue, there is no binding obligation on the United States to pay them. I go as far as the farthest in protecting the faith and credit of the United States as to all its valid obligations. I will not go further. I will not consent to tax the people of the United States to the amount of five millions for fraudulent, invalid obligations, lest the credit of the Government might be impaired. I want light. I do not say how far or to what extent the faith of the United States is pledged to pay these bonds. I cannot determine that question until the actions and doings of this board of audit is ascertained and made public.

My friend from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] has clearly shown us that this board of audit had no authority to receive any claims after July last, still less had they a right to audit them. I do not know whether it be true or not that they have ever issued certificates on claims received after that date. I am wholly in the dark on that subject. All that I mean to say is, if they have their action is invalid and the certificates are void. I wish therefore to abolish this board of audit.

Mr. BOGY. I understand that the board of audit is now at work issuing certificates of indebtedness and issuing 3.65 bonds. I am so informed. Whether my information is correct or not, of course I do not pretend to know.

Mr. STEVENSON. And therefore my amendment for the abolition of this board of audit is the more material. Every certificate or claim issued after the 1st of July is as worthless as the paper on which it is written. I care not whether such certificates are held by innocent holders or not. We have rumors enough of the rashness of this board of audit to demand of the Senate every possible guard against the exercise of unauthorized power by officials in this District. It was for the very reason that I heard what the Senator from Missouri has told us that the board of audit was still receiving claims for audit that I proposed my amendment. I do not mean to reflect on the board of audit. I wish to do them no injustice. It may be that their action has been misrepresented. If so, my amendment can do no harm. It can injure nobody. "To be forewarned is to be forearmed."

The law has been sadly misconstrued. I think the commissioners have misconstrued it, and most assuredly the board of audit have grievously done so. Let us guard the act by limitations about which there can be no doubt.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend from Kentucky is as confident as he seems to be that the power of the board of audit has expired, there is no necessity for his amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I say to the honorable Senator that the information conveyed to the Senate by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. BOGY] is that although the power of the board to receive claims expired on 1st of July, 1875, yet that this auditing board is at this moment going on in receiving and auditing claims.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. This would not prevent it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I differ with the Senator. It would prevent it. It would at least stop the sale of bonds and certificates.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They would not stay abolished. If they have been abolished by limitation of law this will not add anything to it. Let me read the statute again:

That the board of audit constituted by section 6 of the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, be continued until otherwise provided by law with all the powers and duties specified in said section.

Mr. MORTON. Has it been "otherwise provided" since?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has not been, as I understand and believe, provided otherwise. That is the law, and so stands now. They were continued until otherwise provided by law.

Mr. BOGY. Is there no limitation to that?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Not the slightest. All this has sprung up under a misapprehension. My honorable friend from Missouri argues a limitation on that from this clause, as I understand:

And the time for presenting claims is hereby extended for the period of thirty days.

That is all the act that I am aware of.

Mr. STEVENSON. Which act is the Senator reading from, the act of the 3d of March, 1875?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; the act of the 21st of December, 1874.

Mr. BOGY. There was an act subsequent to that.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. What my honorable friend from Missouri suggests as a limitation is no limitation at all upon the act. It is a limitation upon the authority to present a certain class of claims within thirty days.

I wish to say one word to my honorable friend from Kentucky, who I know is disposed to do what is right. He should remember that the board of audit is an independent board in its authority, as independent of the discretion or control of the commissioners as the Senate itself.

Mr. STEVENSON. I so understand.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. But I understood my honorable friend to say that he was surprised that this board would allow the auditing board to examine that class of claims.

Mr. STEVENSON. I did not intend to be so understood. What I intended to say was that I wondered that the commissioners should not have looked to see that this board of audit was exceeding its powers.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They had not the slightest supervision or control over the board of audit. The board of audit was entirely independent of the board of commissioners. Each acted in its own sphere.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator from Maine be kind enough to explain a little more? We do not understand him here. I should like to inquire the date of the statute he has been reading.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The 21st of December, 1874.

Mr. DAWES. Does the Senator know what is the date of the statute that the Senator from Missouri has been reading?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I was commenting on that statute.

Mr. DAWES. The same statute?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The same statute, as I understand. The Senator from Missouri argued that the limitation as to filing a certain class of claims within thirty days limited also the authority of the commissioners to act.

Mr. DAWES. I understood the Senator from Missouri to speak of a statute that was passed in 1875.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It has not been called to my attention.

Mr. DAWES. If the Senator from Maine will permit me, I will make the inquiry of the Senator from Missouri what is the date of the statute.

Mr. BOGY. I read from the act of the 3d of March, 1875, which is the last act on the subject.

Mr. DAWES. Will the Senator read it again?

Mr. BOGY. It is:

That the board of audit constituted by the act entitled "An act for the government of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved June 20, 1874, may receive, audit, and allow just claims against said District of the first and second classes mentioned in the sixth section of said act, and claims for refunding sewer taxes, notwithstanding the limit of time for presentation contained in said act, and in the joint resolution to continue said board of audit, approved December 21, 1874: Provided, That such claims shall be presented prior to the 1st day of July next.

My friend from Maine read from the resolution passed in December, 1874. I understand his argument.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire, then, from the Senator from Maine what effect upon the law of 1874 the law of 1875 had?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. None at all as to the duration of the board.

Mr. DAWES. I am not inquiring particularly as to the duration of the board, but as to its power.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It does not enlarge its power to my understanding, but it gives claimants of a certain class a further time to present their claims to the board. In that sense it does enlarge the power.

Mr. DAWES. Does it not limit those claims to the 1st of July, 1875?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Doubtless. That is, it gives further time to some of the classes of claimants that had been recognized by the act of 1874; gives them a further day in court.

Mr. DAWES. When that day passed what would be their condition?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Upon every other class of claims which could be brought before them, they are continued.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator does not quite understand me. What would be the condition of those holding that class of claims mentioned in the statute of 1875?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If what?

Mr. DAWES. After July, 1875.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. They would be without remedy of audit, that is all. What I said in the beginning and what I repeat now is that by the act of 1874 this board does exist until Congress orders otherwise. It does not exist for all purposes. So far as the class of claims to which reference has been made is concerned, it does not exist, because the time for presenting those claims has expired; but nevertheless the board exists, and hence the propriety, or pertinency at least, of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky, if that is the proper thing to do.

Mr. BOGY. Allow me to ask the Senator a question. I am a seeker after the truth. I desire light. The Senator from Maine says that, under the provision of the joint resolution of 1874, the board of audit continues in existence until otherwise provided by law. Granting that that be so, that same joint resolution limits its power of allowing claims after a given time.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Claims of a certain class.

Mr. BOGY. Pardon me; it limits the power of allowing claims after a given time. The Senator from Maine—and he is sustained by the Senator from California and also by the Senators from Indiana and Ohio, I think—contends that the board of audit originally had the power to pass upon claims not enumerated in the sixth section of the act of 1874 but enumerated in the first section of that law; and, to understand ourselves, we should have to go primarily to the construction of the first law passed, to wit, the law of 1874, to ascertain what power the board of audit had under that law, and then see what power has been continued by these extension laws. Now, I take it, according to the construction of the Senator from Maine, that although the board of audit does exist, yet it has no power to receive claims to be allowed after the 1st of July, 1875.

Mr. CRAGIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BOGY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRAGIN. Had not the board of audit the power to consider and determine all claims filed prior to the limitation in that law of 1874? May they not have been filed at that time and not been considered until a long time afterward? That is the fact, and that is what they have been doing.

Mr. BOGY. I presume that the jurisdiction when once it has attached would continue; the judicial power would remain, and the law does not prevent them from acting. It limits "the time for presenting claims." Claims that have been presented prior may be passed upon now. I presume that is so; but I understand that is not the fact. One of the troubles that we are laboring under in passing upon a matter of this importance is that we receive our information from outsiders. My information may be wrong——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Senator rose to ask me a question. I am listening to a speech.

Mr. BOGY. I was going to ask a question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I will hear the Senator with great pleasure.

Mr. BOGY. I do not care to say more just now.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Did the Senator from Massachusetts rise to ask me a question?

Mr. DAWES. I understand the Senator to have answered the questions that I put; but while I am on the floor, if the Senator from Maine——

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If I am not liable to be further interrogated, I hope now we shall come to a vote.

Mr. DAWES. While I am on the floor, if the Senator will indulge me, he has the statute before him, and I ask him to be kind enough to tell me, with the statute before him, whether anybody could file with the board of audit a claim for work done upon sewers?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I cannot answer. All I can say about that is that I understand that, so far as the claims recognized by the resolution of 1874 and the statute of 1875 are concerned, as to that class of claims, they have not the authority to receive them

Mr. DAWES. So, as the Senator is informed, they have not any authority.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In regard to that class of claims where there is a limitation on the time of their presentation.

Mr. DAWES. Then if it be true that last Friday while we were debating this law claims to the amount of eighty or ninety thousand dollars were audited by the board, the Senator from Maine does not know any authority for it?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I neither know about the fact nor the authority. I should say the inference would be such as is drawn by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] to the amendment.

Several SENATORS. Let it be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment to the amendment, as follows:

Provided, That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall immediately upon the approval of this act transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceeding not hitherto made.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment originally proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as amended.

Mr. BOGY. Let it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported as it now stands.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment as amended reads:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: Provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000. And there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase or aid and abet in increasing such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years and by fine not exceeding $10,000: And provided further, That the board of audit created by the act for the government of the District of Columbia, approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall immediately upon the approval of this act transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to turn the amendment that I had the honor to offer, as it now appears to be attached to a proviso which in a legal sense is a limitation upon the effect of some preceding paragraph or section in the bill, into a separate section, so that there shall be a full stop at the end of what is the preceding proviso, and then this shall begin. I believe we do not now say "Be it further enacted," but let it be a section, so that it shall begin as an independent proposition against an increase of indebtedness.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That transposition will be made.

Mr. SARGENT. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this is a joint resolution, and it may be a query whether there can be more than one section to a joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There may be as many sections to a joint resolution, as my friend will see on looking into the statutes, as to a bill. That is a mere matter of the form of title. The Constitution authorizes a joint resolution just as much as a bill, and it must be presented to the President. It has the same force of law as a bill. Legislation should be by bill, I admit. I do not believe in the joint resolution business; but the legal effect is precisely the same.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the transposition will be made. The Chair hears no objection. The question recurs on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa as amended, which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EATON. I offer this amendment:

And provided further, That this act shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a provision already in the bill to that effect—not in those exact words, but to that effect—non-concurred in by the Senate, but which will be a question again in the Senate. If the Senator, therefore, will postpone the amendment until we get into the Senate, perhaps he will subserve the same end by action on the proviso to which I refer in the Senate.

Mr. EATON. If there is any such proviso it has escaped my notice.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask that the second proviso of the bill as it came from the House to the Senate be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The following proviso in the House resolution has been stricken out:

And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That is the purpose of the Senator.

Mr. EATON. Not quite. I understand that until the bill is signed, that provision does not become a law. In other words, suppose the bill should not be signed until the 15th day of February, the board could go on issuing these bonds until that day, and not afterward. I propose that the United States shall not be liable for the payment of the principal or interest of any bond that may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January last. Therefore my honorable friend from Maine will see that there is a very great difference between the amendment which I propose and the provision in the bill itself which has been stricken out.

I want to give my reasons briefly for this amendment. I introduced a resolution this morning, hoping it would pass unanimously, but under the rules it went to the table. I understand, and I have no doubt of the truth of what I state, that on Thursday last a resolution was passed by this issuing board that no 3.65 bonds should be issued until after action should have been taken by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. As my friend is making a statement now in the nature of the testimony, I hope he will state what he means by "the board." There are two boards here, one the board of audit, which issues a certificate, and the other the board of sinking-fund commissioners who issue the bonds. I wish to know which of these classes of officers are guilty of the offense now stated by the Senator?

Mr. EATON. If I am not uncommonly stupid, before I get through the honorable Senator from Ohio will understand me. I cannot give the distinctive title of the board, nor is it necessary; but a resolution was passed that pending action here no bonds should be issued. I speak now of certificates, and I suppose therefore it is that body that receives the certificates upon which bonds are issued. It was a very proper resolution, permit me to say. When the Congress of the United States had taken the matter in hand, this board ought not to issue anything until Congress should determine what they could properly do. As I said, they voted that they would not issue for a certain number of days any other bonds. I understand that, in violation of that resolution, they have issued bonds amounting to hundreds of thousands of dollars, and, in my judgment, are doing it this very moment while I am talking. I do not propose, for one, that the Government of the United States shall become liable to pay either the principal or the interest upon bonds issued under circumstances of this character.

I do not propose to vote for this bill at all. I will not vote to saddle the people of the United States with fifteen or twenty million dollars more of indebtedness. I remember that it is the last feather that breaks the back of the camel. I say I will not vote to saddle the people of the United States with fifteen or twenty million dollars more of indebtedness until a committee of this or the other body or a joint committee of Congress determines what of this debt ought to be properly paid by the Government of the United States. I desire to perfect this bill if it is to pass. I desire to guard it as much as possible, although I will not vote for it myself, and at the proper time I will make a motion that this matter be committed to a committee for examination, for it needs it.

The Senator from California asks who charges guilt here. Why, sir, everybody charges it. It is in the air; it is all around the head of the Senator from California this moment. It is known to the whole world, the reading world, that there is guilt here. Where is it? Let an examination be had, and we shall ascertain where it is. This is not a party question. I should scorn myself if I acted upon this matter as a party man. I desire to protect the people of the United States; the people of my own State who are now suffering under a taxation such as no people on God's earth ever suffered before. Six hundred million dollars are annually taken out of the hard earnings of the people of the United States to carry on the national, State, and municipal governments of the United States, and it is about time that we looked at this matter, not as partisans but as patriots, if I may use the expression.

I charge no party; I charge no man as a party man with having been guilty of any wrong here. Let us examine this matter thoroughly and see if there be wrong, and if these bonds are not valid bonds refuse to pay them. That is our business. I desire, at all events, that this amendment should be adopted as a part of this bill if it is to pass, and I hope that no Senator will object to it. Let me add, or rather repeat, that the very moment this matter was taken possession of by the House of Representatives that was the time these boards should have ceased action, and not in the dark undertake to crowd three or four hundred thousand dollars more of this paper upon the people of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. Upon a reference to the statute under which these bonds are issued, I find that the authority is conferred by the act of June 20, 1874; and I call the attention of Senators to it. It is found at page 120 of the statutes of the Forty-third Congress. After providing that the board of audit may issue certificates, it then provides as follows:

That the sinking-fund commissioners of said District are hereby continued.

My colleague is not present, or I should endeavor to ascertain whether the sinking-fund commissioners of the District are appointed by the local authorities or under a law of Congress. I do not know, and if any Senator can tell me I should like to have him state it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think they are appointed under the local law.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is a very important consideration.

Mr. STEVENSON. I do not see anything in the act authorizing their appointment, and I have found no act of Congress authorizing it. I think the commissioners are appointed by a local law, although I have no positive knowledge of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have endeavored by reference to these statutes to find whence these commissioners come, by what law they were created. I have not been able to get any law of the District of Columbia which authorizes the appointment of sinking-fund commissioners; but they must undoubtedly be created by local law, because there is no provision in any statute of the United States providing for sinking-fund commissioners except the passage that I am now reading:

That the sinking-fund commissioners of said District are hereby continued.

They must then have had their existing powers conferred upon them by a local law or a general law.

Mr. HAMLIN. They were provided for by the territorial government.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then the law goes on and provides:

And it shall be the duty of said sinking-fund commissioners to cause bonds of the District of Columbia to be prepared—

In a certain form, describing their character, in which "the faith of the United States is hereby pledged;" and then the act provides—and this is the only authority conferred by this act to exchange them for any form of security—as follows:

And the said sinking-fund commissioners are hereby authorized to exchange said bonds at par for like sums of any class of indebtedness in the preceding section of this act named, including sewer taxes or assessments paid, evidenced by certificates of the auditing board provided for in this act.

This law expressly confers upon the board of sinking-fund commissioners the power to exchange the 3.65 bonds prescribed by this section for an equal amount of certificates. I do not know who composed the board of sinking-fund commissioners. I do not know what persons are named. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] imputes to these gentlemen something that is grossly wrong; but it seems to me, if they have so acted in bad faith and not for good purposes, it is a great crime, not only against the people of this District but against the people of the United States. He charges, if I understand, that these commissioners, upon the passage of this act by the House of Representatives, resolved that they would issue no more bonds under the authority of the act of 1874; that they would suspend their operations for a week; and yet in defiance of their own resolution have proceeded to issue a large amount of bonds. I do not know whether that be true or not. I do not know whether this is the fact or not. I only know that the statement of the Senator from Connecticut throws upon the conduct of these commissioners such a doubt that, whoever they are, (and I do not know their names,) I am not disposed myself to vote, to sanction, or authorize, or approve as binding the bonds issued by them without a fair inquiry. At the same time I can see that the action of the Senate in this matter may greatly jeopardize and greatly endanger the rights of innocent parties. We have conferred upon these men authority by the plain letter of the law, and they have issued the bonds in pursuance of our authority. They have the right to do it. It is their legal duty to do it. We gave them the authority to do it. The authority conferred by the language of this law is mandatory, although not so in express terms. An authority conferred is a mandate always where the rights of third parties intervene. Yet, in view of the statement of the Senator from Connecticut casting doubts upon the propriety of the conduct of some of these boards, upon the legality of their action, in a very faint way it seems to me, we ought not to provide for the interest of these bonds until we examine further into their legality. At the same time the Senator from Connecticut is careful not to charge that the certificates that have been taken up by the issue of these bonds were wrong, or fraudulent, or even erroneous. The Senator said that the commissioners, having resolved not to do what the law authorized them to do, reconsidered their determination and issued a certain amount of these bonds. This is rather vague; but, upon a statement thus made by a Senator taking the responsibility of his statement, I feel disposed to vote for his amendment, and then he will be called upon by public opinion, by the common sense of justice which exists in the mind of every man in the United States, to make good a charge which will tend to show that these funding commissioners acted corruptly, or fraudulently, or wrongfully, or heedlessly.

It seems to me, therefore, that while we may properly upon this statement suspend the payment of interest on the bonds issued since the day mentioned by the Senator from Connecticut, yet that upon him must rest the duty hereafter of bringing to the Senate such facts as may show that these officers have acted wrongfully, or fraudulently, or illegally, or corruptly.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no disposition to do any gentlemen injustice; but when I know the fact to be that the president of the board of funding commissioners was eminent among the memorialists who complained against what they charged were wrongs in this District and a violation of the law—I refer to Mr. Corcoran—and when I hear his party friends get up and say that the board over which he presides have done something which implies guilt, guilt so strong that it centers around our heads, that he who runs may read it and cannot help observing it, I wish to ask whether in justice to this gentleman it is not possible that there is an explanation of this matter? The board were required by the statute which the Senator from Ohio has read, by a mandate therein—because it becomes a mandate if the rights of third parties are involved—to issue bonds taking up certificates which were issued by another board. These certificates might or might not be converted, according to the wish of the holders. If the holders called upon the board of sinking-fund commissioners and asked that they should be exchanged, it was the duty of the funding commissioners under this statute to make the exchange. A week or ten days ago they may have resolved, on account of the agitation of this matter before Congress, that it was inexpedient to comply with this statute or to issue bonds to persons who held these certificates. Persons thinking it was the last opportunity they could have to comply with the law, to have the advantage of the law, and have honest certificates exchanged, they may have been persuaded, either by counsel or otherwise, that the statute was plain, that they ought to issue them, and considering that the demands were legitimate and right, they were asked to reconsider their determination and allow the conversion into bonds. If that is so—and certainly it is plausible; it may be so—then there was no guilt and nothing that was wrong. I make this explanation in justice to an eminent gentleman of this city whom I have named, although he belongs to a board for which I have no responsibility, and certainly with whom I have no political sympathies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should not wish to agree in regard to the law laid down by the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from California, that this authority to the commissioners of the sinking fund is a mandatory authority that they are bound to answer to on the application of every certificate-holder. Therefore I do not think that they could properly stand upon the idea that the law compelled them to issue a bond wherever a certificate was presented; but I think they can stand on still better ground if during this discussion they have been issuing bonds, and that is that it would not be apparent to them that this bill would ever reach a vote; and inasmuch as the law gave them an authority, they would feel obliged to go on according to their just discretion and carry it into execution, as there was probability, so far as they could see, that the law would ever be changed. [Laughter.]

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Ohio in his criticism upon my remarks has suggested that the people of the country would hold me responsible for what I have said here, and for my proposition. I accept the responsibility. I am in the habit of accepting responsibility of this character.

Now, I do not regard the statute as of the character the Senator from Ohio supposes. I do not know a single gentleman who is a member of this board, and I do not know the politics of one of them, nor do I care what their politics are; but it seems that when this matter came up before Congress and the information came to them, as it has come to everybody except the Senator from California, and possibly the Senator from Indiana, that there was some error here, not to say fraud, not to say guilt, but that there was something that required examination, this board, in my judgment very properly, passed a resolution to the effect that for a certain time they would issue no further bonds. They are issuing further bonds, as I am informed, against the very terms of their resolution, and in my judgment without the knowledge of all the members of that board. If so, then there is guilt certainly. The Senator from Ohio will agree with me if that be so. I do not know that it is so; but if I can have my way I will find out before this Congress closes its session, and it is the duty of Congress to ascertain all the facts connected with this matter. It adds to the public debt of the United States $15,000,000, and it is time that we, the representatives of the people, look into this matter.

I agree with the sensible remarks which were made by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] and by other Senators, that the United States ought to pay liberally for the expenses incidental to this District. They ought to pay largely, and I do not believe that there is a Senator on this floor who will vote larger appropriations when I know them to be honest and correct, to fall upon the people of the United States, than I will. The people of the State that I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor are anxious and willing and able to pay their full share of the necessary expenses of the Government, and neither my colleague nor myself will be found voting contrary to the wishes of the people of our State.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have but a word to say in regard to this matter. As the resolution now stands, it leaves in doubt and under a cloud and subject to examination the securities of two classes of public creditors: First, those who hold certificates of the board of audit certifying that the District of Columbia is indebted to them in certain fixed amounts passed upon by the board of audit; second, those bonds that have been issued since the date named by the Senator from Connecticut. I am not indisposed to vote for his amendment, and under the circumstances I do not see how we can avoid it. It is rather unpleasant, however, to hang up in suspense public creditors who have the faith of the nation pledged to their payment upon charges so indefinite as these, holders of certificates, we are informed, to the amount of $900,000. I do not know how many bonds have been issued under the circumstances stated by the Senator from Connecticut, but I believe he said $500,000.

Mr. EATON. No, I do not know that one has been issued, to my own knowledge; but I am informed that more than $100 000, and probably $200,000; and if they are at work now, the Lord only knows what the amount will be.

Mr. SHERMAN. Then I understand the outstanding obligations amount to over $1,000,000. All I desire to say is that it is the duty of Congress, as the public faith has been pledged to these persons, if these are honest debts, honestly contracted and honestly issued, that the Government of the United States should in the observance of this public faith give prompt and quick and earnest solution to this question so that these people may know whether or not they hold fraudulent certificates, fraudulent bonds, or whether they hold the honest debts of the United States. I hope the Senator from Connecticut himself will now see that the effect of his proposition is to throw a cloud upon this matter and withhold from payment the interest of outstanding bonds, to hold up like Mahomet's coffin certificates issued by the Government of the United States. I hope they will not be long held in suspense, but that he or some one at least will institute a prompt, quick, speedy, and rigorous inquiry to know whether or not they are an honest debt after all; whether this trouble will not have had merely the effect of suspending the payment of interest due to the honest creditors of the United States.

Mr. BOGY. Let me make an inquiry of the Senator. Does he say that it is competent for the board of audit to take jurisdiction of claims now and allow them, so that it shall become the duty of the sinking-fund commissioners to issue bonds?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not discussed that question, nor have I examined it. I must confess that the laws which have been read here rather confused my mind on the subject.

Mr. BOGY. I think my inquiry pertinent in connection with the point made by the Senator. There are two boards, the board of audit and the board of funding commissioners. The duty of the board of funding commissioners is plain. It is simply to issue bonds for certificates that have been issued for claims audited by the board of audit. If there be $900,000 of certificates outstanding at the present day issued by the board of audit upon claims filed prior to the 1st day of July of last year, it may be, and as it strikes me now the fact is, that we are bound by the action of the board of audit, although it may be true, carrying out the view of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN,] that the board of audit has passed upon these claims since that time. Yet if the claims were filed before the 1st day of July, 1875, and thereby jurisdiction had been taken possession of by that tribunal called the board of audit, though those claims have been passed upon but yesterday, it may be that we are bound by the action of the board of audit. That being so, the duty of the funding commissioners under this vicious system—but yet it is the system which we have given birth to ourselves—would be to issue the bonds; and in doing so they would do no wrong. They take the law as it is, and if the law is not a wise one, it is our fault and not theirs. If there be eight or nine hundred thousand dollars of these certificates outstanding issued, although but yesterday, upon claims filed before the limitation expired, which was the 1st day of July last, I think we are bound by the action of the board of audit, and the bonds in that respect would be legally and properly issued so far as the law is concerned.

Mr. CRAGIN. I desire to understand the statement of the Senator from Connecticut. I understood the Senator from Connecticut this morning to say that this board of sinking-fund commissioners——

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Connecticut did not name the board, for he did not know the board.

Mr. CRAGIN. At any rate the board that issues the bonds. I understood him to say that that board had resolved not to issue any bonds for one week. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. EATON. That is my information.

Mr. CRAGIN. I understood him to say when he was last on the floor that they resolved that they would not issue any more bonds until this bill was passed by Congress.

Mr. EATON. No, I did not. If I did say so, I did not intend to say so, and I do not wish to convey that impression. It was for one week, and I have dated my proposed amendment back a week. It was for a week, supposing, as I was informed, that that would be all the time required for Congress to act in regard to the subject-matter.

Mr. CRAGIN. Then I understand that point. Now I suppose we all understand perfectly that the board of audit, as it is called, takes into consideration claims, whatever they are, filed prior to July, 1875; and the board of audit issues certificates. That is the end of their work. Those certificates pass into the hands of individuals, persons entitled to those certificates who had the claims. Then those individuals holding these certificates convert them whenever they please; it is at their option whether they will have them converted into bonds or not, or whether they will hold the certificates. They hold them as long as they please, and then they go to the board of sinking-fund commissioners, if they conclude to convert them into bonds, and present them there; and that board has nothing to do, if the certificates are regular and right, except to give bonds therefor. The board of sinking-fund commissioners have rules, and my understanding is that they have all along only issued bonds or transacted this business on a certain day of the week, or perhaps possibly two days of the week; one day, I know, for I have been there myself. I went there once and could not transact any business, for I was told that they issued bonds on a certain day. I apprehend that probably it will turn out that from the time they last issued up to the day fixed by them would be about a week; and this, very likely, will turn out to be all there is of the information which has been imparted to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. EATON. No, I think not.

Mr. CRAGIN. It may be. But suppose it is not so; suppose they had resolved that they would not issue any bonds upon these certificates presented, for a week; certainly they had a perfect right to reconsider that vote. They had a perfect right to issue under the law. The law did not require them to pass any such resolution. It was a resolution for their government simply, and they had an undoubted right to change it, if they saw good reasons for doing so. There is nothing illegal in it. Certainly the Senator will not so contend.

These certificates that have been issued by the board of audit and have not been converted into bonds are just as much a debt to all intents and purposes as the bonds themselves, in my judgment. I am in favor of limiting these; I am in favor of fixing the amount beyond which no power can go; but the fact that there may be a few certificates out that have not been converted into bonds does not, in my judgment, lessen their legality. The certificates are a debt against somebody and probably will have to be paid, whether by the Government of the United States or by some other authority I cannot say.

Mr. BAYARD. Suppose they have been issued without value?

Mr. CRAGIN. That I have nothing to say about. I take it that they are all genuine certificates, issued for valid claims. I do not know anything to the contrary and I take it for granted that is so.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not take it for granted at all. Things are supposed to be right until they are shown the other way, but I do not think it is entirely a clear case. I wish it was.

Mr. EATON. I wish to say a few words only in reply to the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CRAGIN.] I suppose the cause of the action of the members of this board that I speak of was that there was conversation all about the city of Washington, which had been heard by everybody except two gentlemen in it, that there was some doubt about the legality of the certificates and the equity of them, and therefore, until Congress had examined into them and passed upon this matter, which they supposed would take six or eight days, there should be no further bonds issued; and I think it was a very wise conclusion they came to, and I do not like the looks of the thing in changing their determination.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if congressional speeches were legal tender for debt like a greenback—I do not know but that we can make them so—I should think this interest was in a fair way of being liquidated; I am not sure but there is some danger of its being overpaid; and I am not sure but in that contingency we are in danger of inflating the circulation even beyond the desires of us western gentlemen who are supposed to have a very sharp appetite in that direction. [Laughter.]

I understand that there was a certain interest that fell due on the first day of this month to the holders of certain securities issued and put in circulation upon the faith of the United States that provision should be made for paying the interest at a specified time. Now, unsophisticated as I am, I supposed we had but one duty before us, and that was to provide in time for the payment of that interest.

These questions which have been debated here are very interesting. That they ought to be settled before we pay our debts is a point upon which I am not so clear. If that can be so, I see a very easy way of postponing the payment of this debt forever, and perhaps we can postpone by some means just as fair the payment of all our debts forever. I myself, as a citizen of the United States, would like extremely well to know whether the commissioners of the sinking fund mentioned in the statute of 1874 have issued bonds without authority of law. If that be so, and the particular bonds can be pointed out, and it can be shown that they are not in the hands of innocent holders for value without notice, I should be extremely glad to see those bonds confiscated, condemned, burned up, repudiated, or otherwise destroyed. But I have not been able to hear that fact even asserted. That is one of the very few things that I have not heard either asserted or insinuated since this debate commenced. Until that is either asserted or insinuated, I do not see how it stands in the way of our paying what is due, and that is all your bill provides for.

Then there is another question, which undoubtedly is interesting to me as to other citizens of the United States, and that is whether the late territorial government of the District of Columbia was a knavish concern or not, and whether Boss Shepherd is a bigger knave than Boss Tweed. That I should like to have settled in some proper forum; and whether there is a larger number of rascals to be counted in the ranks of the democratic party than in the ranks of the republican party. That thing I would like to have settled. I have a very decided opinion on that point myself at present; but I may be wrong.

But, Mr. President, I have one opinion which I want to give utterance to before this debate closes, and that will be the end of my participation in it. Although I have heard of very extraordinary conduct on the part of the late municipal government of the city of New York, and very extraordinary conduct on the part of the late territorial government of the District of Columbia, I have not yet heard of anything charged against either which impressed me as a more heinous offense against good morals and honest dealing than is to my apprehension our conduct here in the Senate to-day in postponing the payment of a debt which everybody acknowledges to be due. The public officer who contracts in the name of the public an obligation dishonestly and profligately ought to be held up to condign punishment. The sooner it is done the better. But what shall we say of officers who refuse to pay or postpone the payment of a debt which is honestly due and admitted to be honestly due? Now I myself do not own any of these bonds. I do not know of a single human being who does own them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You owe them.

Mr. HOWE. My friend suggests that I owe some of them. I suppose I am a party to them, being a citizen of the United States, and therefore I want them treated as I try to treat my own individual obligations: pay them whenever they become due. I say I am not interested in any of these bonds, but I do wish the Congress of the United States would just vote to pay the interest which fell due day before yesterday. Provide the means of paying that and then I will sit here by day or by night with any gentleman who supposes the public has cause of complaint against any officer now in being or any man who has been in office at any time heretofore or any white man who is suspected of being likely to get into office at any time hereafter and settle every one of these causes of complaint. But first do our duty, and I think then we shall be in a cleaner condition to enforce the duty of other persons.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole. The first amendment, that of the committee, will be read.

Mr. SHERMAN. Altogether.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the last clause which was moved by the Senator from Connecticut read. I do not understand it.

The Chief Clerk read:

Provided, That this act shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

Mr. EATON. There is a clerical error there.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. There is a prior question to that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there more than one amendment from the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But one.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So that this clause which has been read is a part of that amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. No; it is independent of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If there is only one amendment of the Committee of the Whole, that must be a part of it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the committee was simply to strike out a clause of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Speaking of the committee who reported the resolution; and that amendment should be concurred in, because it is now substituted by another amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment takes precedence. The question will be on concurring in the amendment originally reported by the Committee on Appropriations, striking out certain provisos.

The Chair put the question, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish the Chair would state again precisely what the question is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee that reported the joint resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; let us hear that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Appropriations reported to the resolution an amendment, which was agreed to in Committee of the Whole, striking out the following words:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited; And provided further, That nothing in this resolution contained shall involve the Government of the United States in any obligation to pay principal or interest of any such bonds which have been issued contrary to or not in pursuance of law.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Allow me to suggest that the Senator from Connecticut has a substitute for that last proviso, which has been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and this amendment ought to be concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendment striking out the words which have just been read.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on concurring in the other amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EATON. I mistook the title because the Chair called it a bill, and I find it is a resolution. The amendment which I proposed should be corrected by striking out the word "act" and inserting "resolution," so that it may be in accordance with the original title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that change will be made. The question is on concurring in the amendment as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add to the end of the resolution the following:

Provided, That any further issue of 3.65 bonds under or by virtue of said act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, is hereby prohibited: And provided, That the certificates heretofore issued by the board of audit, including those converted into 3.65 per cent. bonds, and those which have not been so converted, and the certificates hereafter to be issued by the board of audit or their successors in office, shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $15,000,000.

SEC. 2. That there shall be no increase of the present amount of the total indebtedness of the District of Columbia; and any officer or person who shall knowingly increase or aid or abet in increasing such total indebtedness shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding ten years, and by fine not exceeding $10,000: Provided, That the board of audit, created by the "act for the government of the District of Columbia," approved June 20, 1874, is hereby abolished, and shall, immediately upon the approval of this resolution, transmit all the books and property in their possession belonging to the District to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, and make a report of their proceedings not hitherto made: And provided further, That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps I ought to say in reference to the penal clause which I moved and which has been agreed to in committee, that I did not move it out of any want of confidence in the present commissioners or on the idea that they would knowingly violate the law; but because they are obliged in a large degree to depend upon the reports of subordinates, whom I do not know, and because they may have successors, and therefore I thought it fit that the proper penalty should be provided for a known violation of the statute.

Mr. WHYTE. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Vermont to the phraseology used by him in this penal clause of a joint resolution. It is rather, I think, anomalous legislation, at all events, to put a penal clause in a joint resolution. It may have occurred before in the legislation of Congress, but I do not recollect ever to have seen such a thing done hitherto in legislation. If it is to be adopted, I should like it to go from the Senate in proper form, and therefore I venture to make a suggestion to the Senator from Vermont.

He has used the term "a high misdemeanor." If he means that these officers shall be liable to impeachment, shall be tried by the Senate under the Constitution of the United States, and means to use the words "high misdemeanor" in the sense of "high crime and misdemeanor," we can probably understand his intention. But if he means to make it an offense punishable by a court of law, I submit to him that under the Constitution of the United States Congress must declare what shall be a crime or misdemeanor, must not only affix the penalty to it, but must declare also in what court of law the party shall be tried. I therefore suggest to the Senator from Vermont that he had better strike out "high misdemeanor," and after "conviction thereof" put in the words "in the supreme court of the District of Columbia." Otherwise it will leave it hereafter to be questioned somewhere whether the officer who fails to perform his duty by obeying the prohibition in this joint resolution shall be tried by impeachment or whether he shall be tried in the criminal court or court having criminal jurisdiction in this District. I think there can be no question that if a penalty is imposed upon an officer for doing that which is declared to be a misdemeanor, if it occurs in a State, of course he is triable in the United States court within the State; but occurring as this does outside the limits of a State, it ought to be declared in the act that he shall be triable in the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I must express a little surprise at the observations which have fallen from my learned friend from Maryland. I have had the impression that the power to remove from office for high crimes and misdemeanors upon an impeachment by the House of Representatives and a trial in this body was a concurrent and independent power—concurrent in respect I mean of dealing with the offense; I do not mean that any other tribunal has power to remove from office—with the criminal courts of the country; and that if the President of the United States or the Secretary of the Treasury should in violation of law embezzle the moneys of the United States they might not only be impeached by the House of Representatives and removed from office by this body, but they might also, either before or after an impeachment, be made subject to the criminal laws of the country, and be indicted and punished in the district where the offense was committed, under the Constitution. Therefore the object of my amendment was not merely that any person or employé who might make a false report to the commissioners of the District of Columbia, or the commissioners of the sinking fund, or the board of audit, or whatever, as to the state of the total indebtedness of this District which should lead these latter persons innocently to increase the debt above the limit, should be punished as criminals, as they might be and ought to be I think if they do it knowingly, as this provides; but also that any officer of the United States, not an employé, not any private person who had concerted a scheme to increase this indebtedness for his private benefit, but any of these high officers who in the course of time may come to occupy these offices, should be guilty knowingly of increasing this debt, which is now large enough, they might not only be subject to the criminal administration of the law, but also be subject to the higher and more significant punishment to any person who has any sensibility left, of being brought before this tribunal and removed from office and incapacitated from holding it ever after. Therefore I submit to my learned friend that there is nothing in the circumstance that this crime of making this increase knowingly is defined to be a high misdemeanor and a penalty is also affixed. They are totally distinct objects; and the purpose I have stated.

Now, my friend says that I ought to have provided the name of the court which shall have jurisdiction to try this offense which this proposition does define. That is, the knowingly increasing this debt, or abetting in its increase, is declared to be a high misdemeanor, and then it affixes the penalty. Then the question is, How is the party to be tried? The Constitution of the United States says, so far as the criminal laws go, that he is to be tried in the district where the offense is committed. Well, if the offense should be committed in this District, he must be tried here; but if it should happen to be in Alexandria or in Annapolis or in Baltimore, as it might be, then it would be tried where the offense was committed; and if my friend will look at the Revised Statutes of the United States, at the crimes act, beginning on page 1040 and going through a great many pages, he will perceive that none of those sections have stated what particular court should try an offender, because the Constitution fixes that. Therefore I submit to him that it would be quite unnecessary, superfluous, possibly defeating the very end in view, to say that this offense should be tried in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, because it is possible that the aiding and abetting, if not the increasing, might be done outside this District, and in that case the offender would escape.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I should like to hear the penal clause of the amendment read again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clause will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And every officer or person who shall knowingly increase, or aid or abet in increasing, such total indebtedness, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, &c.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator from Vermont that that should contain the word "fraudulently"—"knowingly and fraudulently;" otherwise it may make an officer responsible for a mere mistake in the law. That prohibits any increase of the public debt of the District. Suppose there is a contract now partly executed, a valid contract entered into and partly executed, if that contract is to be completed, would the payment for the contract be an increase of the public debt? The indebtedness may not be fully realized now, because the work has not been done, although the contract is in existence.

I asked my friend from Vermont yesterday whether the future completion of a contract now in process of execution would be regarded as an increase of the public debt. I understood him to say that it would not; and yet a court might take a different view of it. An officer might say it would not be an increase; a court might say it would; and I think, to make an officer liable, the fraudulent intent should be included, not simply that he does the thing knowingly, for if he does it under a mistake of the law he does it knowingly, but he should do it fraudulently to subject him to high penalties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am obliged to say that I do not agree to the reasoning of the Senator from Indiana. Here is a definite thing which is not to be done, and the motive of the man in doing it, the fraudulent purpose, is no element in the offense, any more than it is in the statute which punishes treason, which declares under the Constitution what treason shall consist of, and then declares that any person guilty of the crime of treason shall be punished. Now, a man may levy war against the United States from the purest motives, just as the United States levied war against the King of Great Britain for the purest motives, and yet if he does not succeed he will be guilty of treason; and though the whole world may say that he is a martyr and a patriot, yet he must stand the consequences and suffer the punishment if he turns out to be wrong. He must take the risks himself. I therefore submit to my friend, on the philosophy of the criminal law, that the word "fraudulently" is only introduced into the punishment of those affirmative offenses in which the moral element must enter, as for instance the embezzlement of money where a man takes it from the public treasury or from his employer for the purpose of appropriating it to his own use. There must be that intent to do it. If he takes it by accident, he is not guilty of embezzlement. But here the law declares that a particular act shall not be done, and if a man with his eyes open willfully does that thing, then the law says he shall be punished. If you are to introduce the word "fraudulently" into a proposition of that kind, then you leave it to a jury who are to try the particular individual to decide, Did this man do this with a wicked purpose? He knew he was going to do it; he knew that the debt was going to be increased; but he thought some great public good would be accomplished by it, as the predecessors of these commissioners did undoubtedly when they knew that they were increasing, in spite of the statute, the indebtedness of this District; but they thought that the end justified the means, and they did not do it fraudulently at all. They did it publicly, in the light of day; said they were doing it; and yet I mean to say that if any man dares to do that again, he shall suffer the punishment of the law.

Mr. MORTON. Let me ask my friend right there whether in his opinion the completion of a contract now in course of execution would be an increase of the public debt beyond the present amount?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not the question I rose to discuss at all. The Senator can put twenty cases under this law or under any other that the ingenuity of man can frame. You may put in as many limitations and provisos and guards as you like, and when it comes to be drawn in question in a court of justice there will be two sides to it, just as there is to this question we have been discussing here for three or four days, and nobody can tell until the court of last resort decides which way it is. When they have decided, nobody can tell whether it is right or not; only for the good of society we have provided courts whose final decisions must be taken to be right for the case to which it is applied.

My own individual opinion is, as I said to my friend, that I do not think it would; that if these gentlemen have made a lawful contract now which definitely provides for certain work and for certain payment for it, that is an indebtedness of the District of Columbia which they are bound to pay. But it may be that I am wrong. They must be careful to keep inside the law.

Mr. MORTON. The effect of this amendment will be to make any officer criminally responsible for the most innocent mistake in regard to the law. I do not think any man would be safe in being an accounting officer under this statute. Take the very case, and I have no doubt that case will abundantly arise, where there are contracts now unfinished and the indebtedness upon which is yet to accrue by work that is yet to be done by the terms of the contract, and if an obligation is given for that unfinished, uncompleted contract or work yet to be done, it will be to that amount an increase of the public debt of this District.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let them pay it out of the taxation, and then it will not be an increase.

Mr. MORTON. But suppose there is no fund?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then they must wait until they get it.

Mr. MORTON. Suppose there is no fund to arise from that source? Here is a question of law arising at once; and if the officer takes the same view with the Senator and gives the obligation, and a court or grand jury take a different view of it, then he is liable to go to the penitentiary for ten years. I think it is absurd myself to punish a man in that way. It is a sort of dead-line; and if you cross that line you are to be shot down under all circumstances. If you punish a man for forgery it must have been done fraudulently, it must have been with criminal intent. An officer must do the act for a fraudulent purpose, understanding full well that he is violating the law. If the law has been settled and then he violates it, it makes a case. It seems to me that the most ordinary protection to a public officer should be that his acts should be required to be shown to have been with a criminal intent before he can be held liable criminally.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not want to make any speech on this matter, but I must say that I entirely agree with the view taken by the Senator from Indiana. Now suppose this case: The debt is limited to $15,000,000; that is the debt; these commissioners want to incur a debt of $200,000 to put the streets in repair, relying on the current taxes, which will be paid them in a few months. If they knowingly increase the debt, they will be liable to the penitentiary. They of course will not do it. If you insert the word "fraudulently," it covers the whole case.

Mr. MORTON. I move to insert that word.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, I think the Senator from Vermont must have misunderstood me when he supposed that I was unaware that there could be both trial by impeachment and trial by a court of law; but he has not answered the objection which I made to the clause inserted upon his motion in this resolution. The Constitution is express upon the subject; and I beg to call the attention of the Senator to the fact:

The trial of all crimes except in cases of impeachment shall be by jury, and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed.

Of course that provision is very clear. If the crime has taken place in some of the States the party would be triable by the district or the circuit court of the United States in that State.

But when not committed within any States, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed,

Now, I should like to know where there is any provision here as to the place where a party shall be tried if the offense is committed in the District of Columbia. This is not my opinion alone; but while I recognize the great ability of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and his legal knowledge, I prefer to take the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States upon a question of this character. In the case of The United States vs. Hudson and Goodwin, in 7 Cranch, it was held "that the legislative authority must first make an act a crime, affix a punishment to it, and declare the court that shall have jurisdiction of the offense before the courts of the United States can exercise jurisdiction over it." And the Supreme Court of the United States affirmed this doctrine in the case of The United States vs. Coolidge and others, 1 Wheaton, 415; and Chief Justice Marshall, n idelivering the opinion of the court in Ex parte Bollman vs. Swartout, in 4 Cranch, re-affirmed it and said:

Courts which originate in the common law possess a jurisdiction which must be regulated by the common law until some statute shall change their established principle. But courts which are created by written law, and whose jurisdiction is defined by written law, cannot transcend that jurisdiction.

Here is a new crime or here is a new offense unknown to the statute law of the United States; it is here for the first time declared to be an offense. If committed within a State, of course the courts of the United States within the State try the party when the grand jury indict; but there is no provision here for any trial in any court outside of a State; and I submit, unless this is intended to be a dead letter, it ought to be amended before it passes through this body.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Did the Senator from Indiana move an amendment?

Mr. MORTON. After the word "knowingly" I move to insert the words "and fraudulently."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will have the effect, as shown by the Senator from New Jersey, whether he so intended it or not, of entirely emasculating the section, because he puts the very case; suppose these commissioners or their successors wish to improve the streets, or repair them, or do anything within their jurisdiction as actors; they have not got any taxes collected, and they proceed to incur a debt which, for the time being, increases the general indebtedness of the District above its total existing at that time. That is not fraudulent, he says; that is honest; they do it publicly and openly. Now, suppose the taxes do not come in; suppose the taxes are not large enough to meet those obligations and duties; then you have an increase of the public indebtedness, publicly, openly, willfully, knowingly done; and yet, as it lacks the element of fraud—that is, a purpose to cheat somebody—you have added to the burden of the over-taxed people of this District and of the United States and have got nothing by your statute.

I hope, Mr. President, if the Senate does not like to put an absolute and sharp limit to any increase of this indebtedness, it will not adopt the amendment of the Senator from Indiana, because the effect of it will be to allow these commissioners and their successors, if they act openly, and publicly, and for what they believe to be the public good, to go on and run up the indebtedness just as far as they like, and we shall be just where we are now in that respect. That would be the effect of it plainly and clearly.

Now, one word to my friend from Maryland and I shall have done. He says that we must provide in this penal clause a place within which the offense is to be tried. He has read the Constitution, which requires that, if not committed within a State, it shall be tried by a court which shall have been previously declared. That is the substance of it; I may not give the very words. If my friend will turn to the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, on page 91, section 761, he will find the following:

> The justices of the supreme court shall severally possess the powers and exercise the jurisdiction possessed and exercised by the judges of circuit courts.
> SEC. 762. Any one of the justices may hold a special term, with the same powers and jurisdiction possessed and exercised by district courts of the United States.
> SEC. 763. Any one of the justices may hold a criminal court for the trial of all crimes and offenses arising within the District.

Therefore we have a tribunal already fixed by law clothed with the jurisdiction of trying all crimes and offenses committed within the District of Columbia, so that we conform to the Constitution. When you go to a State, then my honorable friend will find, as of course he is perfectly familiar with it, that we have district and circuit courts provided in every State invested with the jurisdiction of trying all crimes and offenses against the United States committed in those States and districts. So that whether this offense be committed within the District of Columbia or outside of it, as it may be, in either case we have the tribunal previously provided by law to catch the offender.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana to the amendment.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I wish, Mr. President, to give one reason why I shall not vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana. Experience has shown us that in these District matters it is the easiest thing in the world for Mr. Shepherd or this board of commissioners or anybody who happens to be in power here to procure opinions from lawyers, whom perhaps they have confidence in if nobody else has, which will justify them in anything they see fit to do. Suppose that under the provision in this bill incorporated by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as amended by the Senator from Indiana, one of these gentlemen in office who has increased this debt to the amount of some millions, as has been done over and over and over again in express defiance of the laws of the United States, comes into court with a written opinion from A, B, and C, telling him that he had the power to do that, and that he had a right to do it, and that it was his duty to do it; then that is to go to the jury as evidence that he, having confidence in these lawyers whom he has consulted, could not have acted fraudulently, but was acting honestly in the matter and as he believed to be right.

I do not propose, after what the records show has been done in that respect in relation to the increase of this indebtedness and its being justified by the opinions of counsel who were undoubtedly well paid for opinions, to give parties who may violate this law another chance to do the same thing.

Mr. MORTON. My friend from New Hampshire supposes the case of an officer intending to commit a fraud, who gets the opinion of a lawyer to cover that fraud; but I prefer to take the case of an officer who is trying to do his duty. A difficult question of law arises, and he consults eminent counsel, or he may consult the Attorney-General of the United States to get an opinion from him, and he may act upon that opinion, and it may turn out that a court takes a different view, and that he is liable to indictment and to go to the penitentiary for a simple mistake of the law. That is the case that I present; but if Senators desire to have this law passed in its present form, I shall not object, and I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAWES. It is a question of fact, not a question of law; and all the opinions in the world would not affect the question of fact. Unless the jury could be made to believe that the defendant did not know the fact, he would come within the penalty. But the trouble with the Senator from Indiana is this, that when a man knows what the law is, and still goes on and violates it, the Senator from Indiana is of opinion that he can do that innocently. That is beyond my comprehension. I can understand that a case may come so near the line that there may be doubts, and that a man may be uncertain whether his course of action will fall on one side of the line or the other; and that makes the propriety of the word "knowingly" in the statute. Without the word "knowingly" it would be simply a question of fact whether in point of fact, whatever may be his own doubts, his act had fallen on the one side or the other of the line. He will be innocent if it cannot be shown that he knowingly did this act; that is, knowing that it was in violation of the law. But the case which is supposed by the Senator is one that cannot be. It cannot be that a man knowing that he is violating the law does it innocently; and "knowingly" and "fraudulently" are tautology in this law. If he violates the provision of this law knowingly, it is beyond his power to show that it is innocently done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Indiana is withdrawn. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is still open to amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I am in a most amiable condition, and I want the attention of the Senate for a single moment. I am willing to vote for anything that will satisfy anybody here in this Senate, I do not care what the limitations or prohibitions are that you put upon it. But I do say that a decent respect for the opinions of mankind, a little respect for the character of this body, and still more respect for the language we speak, make it a disgrace to pass any bill through this body in the form in which this is now presented to us. I move to recommit it to the Committee on Appropriations that they may whip into decent proportion the various disjointed things that have gone into the bill, retaining everything that there is there, that we may vote upon it to-morrow morning in a manner which shall not be disreputable to this body. I move to recommit the bill to the committee.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I object to its going back. I hope the Senate will not have it sent back to the Committee on Appropriations. It never belonged there.

Mr. HAMLIN. Any committee—the committee on leave of absence or any other committee. [Laughter.]

Mr. LOGAN. The committee on reconstruction. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves the recommittal of the joint resolution to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not blame them for not owning it now.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the honorable Senator that the ordinary course of proceeding will naturally bring this bill to a committee of conference, and I hope it will not be delayed here any longer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to recommit.

The motion was not agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to add the amendment I offered while in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is too late to amend. The joint resolution has been read the third time, and the question is on its passage. A motion to reconsider can be made, but an amendment cannot otherwise be offered. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was passed.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

Mr. MORTON. I gave notice last week that I would to-day ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the resolution for the admission of Mr. Pinchback as a member of this body. It is a question of high privilege, and has been too long postponed. I now make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a resolution which will be reported for information.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We know what it is.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator from Indiana to withdraw that motion until a message from the President can be read and referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is merely to take it up, so that it may be the unfinished business for to-morrow. There is no objection to that

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to proceed to the consideration of the resolution named by the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

PROPOSED MINT AT COLUMBUS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Pending that motion the Chair will lay before the Senate a message from the President of the United States.

The Chief Clerk read the message as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

In answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 19th of January instant, requesting the examination, with a view to ascertaining their suitableness for the purposes of a mint, of the building and grounds situated in Columbus, Ohio, known as the Capital University, and proposed to be donated to the United States by F. Michel, of said city, I have the honor to transmit herewith the report of the Director of the Mint, accompanied by a diagram of the building and lot.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 3, 1876.

Mr. THURMAN. I move that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on Finance, with the accompanying papers.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The diagram ought not to be printed.

Mr. THURMAN. No; that need not be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print excepts the diagram.

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of War, calling attention to the constantly increasing and alarming obstructions to navigation of the Upper Mississippi River at or near the towns of Fort Madison and Burlington, Iowa, and recommending an appropriation of $65,000 to remove those obstructions; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Attorney-General, in reply to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th ultimo, in regard to the condition of suits brought against Pacific railroad companies; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

Mr. EATON. I give notice that I shall present to the Senate on Tuesday next the resolutions regarding my late colleague, Senator FERRY.

FRANCIS W. SYKES.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Francis W. Sykes, late contestant from the State of Alabama, the pay and mileage of a Senator from the 4th day of March, 1873, to the 28th day of May, 1874.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on my motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened and (at five o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned

---

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. MAGOON, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some remarks which he had prepared on the proposed constitutional amendment in regard to the term of the presidential office. (See Appendix.)

COST OF SIGNAL SERVICE.

Mr. CLYMER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to report to this House the entire cost during the last fiscal year of the Signal Service, including a detailed statement of every disbursement made for materials, salaries of officers, enlisted or detailed men, correspondence, telegraph service, maintenance of stations and lines and the location of the same, rent, printing, lithographing, and all other items, charges, costs, and disbursements, of every kind and nature whatsoever, which may form part of the cost of such Signal Service and the publication of the results thereof.

THE LATE HON. HENRY H. STARKWEATHER.

Mr. WHEELER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be directed to insert the following item in the bill making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877:

To enable the Clerk of the House to pay to the widow of Henry H. Starkweather, late a member of the House, a sum equal to the salary of a member of Congress from the date of the death of said Starkweather to the end of the present session of Congress, $2,500.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire simply to say, Mr. Speaker, that under your appointment I accompanied the remains of the late Hon. Henry H. Starkweather to his home in Connecticut. While there I became acquainted with his pecuniary circumstances, and while this is not the place, nor am I at liberty, to speak of details, I take the liberty of saying that this provision will be a most timely and welcome allowance to the widow and children of Mr. Starkweather. I trust there will be no objection to adopting the resolution.

There was no objection, and the resolution was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

Mr. YOUNG, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1801) to provide for the building of a custom-house, post-office, &c., at Memphis, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REMOVAL OF A JUDGE IN COLORADO.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent to offer for present consideration the preamble and resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is believed that certain political and personal influences have been exerted to secure the removal of a Federal judge and the appointment of another in his stead in the Territory of Colorado, for the corrupt purpose of procuring certain orders, decisions and decrees of court affecting certain mining interests now in litigation before the courts of that Territory: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to this House, at an early day, copies of all letters and papers asking for the removal of Judge Belford, a district judge for the Territory of Colorado, and copies of all letters and papers asking for the appointment of Judge Stone to succeed Judge Belford; also copies of all letters and papers appertaining to the arbitrary and corrupt rulings, orders, and decrees of Judge Stone in the interest of those who asked his appointment now on file in the office of the Attorney-General; also the names of all persons who otherwise than in writing demanded the removal of Judge Belford and the appointment of Judge Stone.

Mr. HALE. I object to the present consideration of this resolution. This is the first time I have ever known any such interference with purely executive appointments.

Mr. GLOVER. I did not hear what was the gentleman's objection. If it is one which can be removed, I will be happy to endeavor to do so.

Mr. HALE. I said that this is the first time I have ever known any such interference with a purely executive appointment. I have no objection to this being sent to the proper law committee of the House, for them to consider whether Congress shall take upon itself to call into question every executive appointment and the reasons for which such an appointment has been made. If the Judiciary Committee of the House believe that it is a competent thing for this House to do to enter upon that vast field, I have no objection to the resolution being sent there, but I do object to its being adopted.

Mr. GLOVER. I consent to the resolution being referred to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. HALE. I wish also to say that I do not know anything about the circumstances of this case. I never heard of them before.

The preamble and resolution were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

PAY OF FOURTEEN DISABLED SOLDIERS.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, from the Committee of Accounts, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1802) making an appropriation to pay fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers, from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I ask that the bill may be considered now. Those soldiers have not received their pay since the 6th of last December, the appropriations having expired.

The bill was read. It appropriates the sum of $10,000 to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the fourteen crippled and disabled Union soldiers now in the employment of the House of Representatives from the 6th day of December, 1875, to the 30th day of June, 1876.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust that my colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana] will have read at the Clerk's desk a letter from the Clerk of the House touching the cause of the necessity for this appropriation. I desire to say further that this subject has been informally before the Committee on Appropriations. An appropriation has been made for some years for this particular class of employés of the House; these fourteen disabled soldiers were on a special list, and an appropriation was not made for them for the entire fiscal year, as is customary with appropriations for that class of employés. The appropriation for their benefit expired on the 6th day of December last; but the current appropriations for the next fiscal year commencing on the 1st of July will contain a proper appropriation for the period after that time. The object of this bill is simply to provide for the payment of this particular class of employés in consequence of the appropriations having expired.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would like to ask my friend from Indiana whether it is not essential that the names of these persons should be incorporated in the bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir; I presume not. The bill is in the form in which it has usually passed the House.

I ought to add, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Appropriations in formally considering this subject deemed it proper that this bill should pass, and if my colleague will have the letter of the Clerk of the House read it will probably explain the whole matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I will read the act of March 3, 1875, appropriating $12,549.60 to pay this class of employés from April until December the 6th. That time having expired the men have been without compensation since December. I read the act:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay fourteen crippled and disabled soldiers in the employment of the Doorkeeper of the House from April 1, 1875, to December 6, 1875, the sum of $12,549.60; which is hereby appropriated.

On an examination of the greater part of these gentlemen yesterday I found that they have received no pay since the 5th of December. I have upon the Clerk's roll the names of these gentlemen employed there to the number of fourteen.

Mr. GARFIELD. Are they the same persons?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. Eight of them are the same persons.

Mr. FORT. I hope this bill may pass, but I desire to make a statement. I have no objections to its passage, even in the words in which it is couched. It states, however, that it appropriates $10,000 to pay fourteen disabled soldiers now upon the roll. Gentlemen here all know that there are not fourteen on the roll. A part of these men are not on the roll now, and I have no complaint to make here about that. Only eight of them are on the roll.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentlemen say that there are not fourteen crippled Union soldiers on the roll?

Mr. FORT. Only eight.

Mr. HOLMAN. My information is, as I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, that there are fourteen disabled Union soldiers on the roll, eight of whom at least were on the roll during the last Congress.

Mr. FORT. That is not the information I have, and I am quite sure I am correct about it.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to ask if my colleague objects to this bill?

Mr. FORT. I have distinctly stated that I do not.

Mr. HOSKINS. The bill, as reported from the Clerk's desk and as reported by the chairman of the Committee on Accounts, received the attention of that committee; and as I am informed by the chairman of the committee—and I believe that the information is correct—out of the fourteen men for whom this money is to be appropriated eight are old employés, holding over from the last Congress, who are now and have been in the service since the commencement of the Forty-fourth Congress. One of the fourteen who held office in the last Congress has died since. Another, as I am informed by the chairman, has left the Capitol and returned to his home, making ten out of the fourteen. The other four, as I am informed, are new appointments. The eight men who have been employed by this Congress from the commencement of the session, of course, have received no pay, because the appropriation passed for their benefit expired on the 6th of December. For one, sir, I am entirely in favor of the passage of this bill. It will provide for eight Union soldiers who served in the last Congress and for six new appointees; and I repeat again that one of those employed last year has died and one has gone home. These fourteen men are carried on the list independent of the force allowed to the Doorkeeper. It was provided in the last Congress that these fourteen men should be employed in addition to the force allowed by law to the Doorkeeper, and it was understood that their services were necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman from New York to say that eight of the fourteen employés during the last Congress are still upon the roll.

Mr. HOSKINS. They are not on the roll; the gentleman will observe they were placed upon a separate list and the appropriation for their services expired on the 6th day of December last; but eight of the employés of the last Congress, as I understand it, are still in the service of the House under the Doorkeeper.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then eight out of the fourteen are still continued in the employment of the House; I wish to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] whether the other six are not also disabled Union soldiers?

Mr. HOSKINS. I am unable to answer that question from my own knowledge, but I understand, and have been so informed by the chairman of the committee who has investigated the matter, that the other six are disabled Union soldiers.

Mr. HOLMAN. I merely wish to add to that statement——

Mr. HOSKINS. I wish to ask the chairman if I am correctly informed in that respect.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. That is so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am informed, not only by the statement made by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] but by the Doorkeeper, who has particular charge of this force, that eight of the old employés are still on the force. There have been appointed in the places of the other six other disabled Union soldiers, so that in fact there are fourteen disabled Union soldiers now upon this force, all of whom have lost an arm or a leg and some of them both hands in the service of the country.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I will now read the names of the eight old employés who are still on the force.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask the gentleman to give the State from which they are appointed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I have not that information at hand, although I have the statement made out. The names of the eight old employés still continued are: Charles E. Diemar, William T. Fitch, Samuel H. Decker, P. W. Coleman, C. W. Reisinger, Henry Cliff, John A. Travis, and George A. Schreiner. The other six are: John Ryan, J. D. Hutton, Thomas G. Hibben from Indiana, (he has one arm,) Edward Webster, James J. McConnell, and Patrick Sullivan.

I had a conversation yesterday with most of these employés; perhaps I did not have it with two of them. I asked if they were employed last year and called the roll, and eight answered to the roll-call. Some of them I examined and asked where they were wounded and when, and if they served in the Union Army.

Mr. FOSTER. Were the last six whose names the gentleman read appointed in place of some who had been discharged?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. In place of one who had died and one who went away and four discharged.

Mr. FOSTER. Why were the four discharged?

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I cannot tell.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman does not know why they were removed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. I do not.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for——

Mr. ATKINS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to withdraw his call until I can submit a report from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RANDALL. I will withdraw the call for that purpose.

Mr. RUSK. I renew the call for the regular order.

Mr. ATKINS. I believe the Committee on Appropriations are entitled to report at any time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to report a bill from that committee?

Mr. ATKINS. I am instructed by the committee to report a resolution to which I think there will be no objection if the House will hear it read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the resolution, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

SIOUX AGENCY.

The Clerk read the preamble and resolution, as follows:

Whereas it appears from a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, Executive Document No. 57, addressed to the Speaker of this House, and from the papers accompanying the same, that the appropriation for the subsistence and support of the Sioux Indians for the current fiscal year is already exhausted, and a deficiency appropriation of $225,000 is asked for, and it is alleged that a portion of said first-named appropriation was misapplied in the subsistence and support of other than Sioux Indians: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested, under the power given him by law, to require a competent experienced military officer of the United States to execute the duties of an Indian agent so far as to repair to the Red Cloud agency, and in his discretion to other Sioux agencies, with instructions to inquire into the causes of said deficiency, and to report them to the President with all practicable dispatch, as also his opinion as to any further and what amounts should be appropriated for the subsistence and support of said Indians for the remainder of the current fiscal year.

No obection being made, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRACTICE IN UNITED STATES COURTS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at fourteen minutes before one o'clock. The first business in order is the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 934) regulating the practice of United States circuit and district courts as to the time and manner of instructing juries and arguing the cause. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] has called the previous question upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It provides that the circuit and district courts of the United States, in all criminal trials and civil causes other than equity and admiralty causes, shall conform to the practice existing at the time in like trials and causes in the courts of record of the State within which such circuit or district courts are held, both as to the time and manner of instructing the jury and conducting the argument of the case before the jury, any rule of the court to the contrary notwithstanding.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time. Being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KNOTT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DISTRICT JUDGES SITTING OUT OF THEIR DISTRICTS.

Mr. CAULFIELD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1485) to provide for the expenses of district judges when holding court out of their own districts.

The bill was read. It provides that whenever a district judge holds a district or circuit court out of his own district, in pursuance of an order of the circuit judge or circuit justice, under section 591 or section 596 of the Revised Statutes, the expenses of such district judge, not exceeding $10 per day, to be certified by him, shall be paid by the marshal of the district in which he so holds court as a part of the expenses of the court, and shall be allowed in the marshal's accounts. The provisions of this act are to apply to all courts held by district judges out of their own district since the 1st day of January, 1876.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question then recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to know why it is proposed to add $10 a day to the salary of a judge because he is required to perform duty out of his district, when if not performing such duty there he would be required to perform similar duty in his own district?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I will explain. When judges are called into districts adjoining their own, districts overcrowded with business, for the purpose of rendering assistance to the judges there, the expenses of these judges going outside their own district must be paid by somebody. To my knowledge the habit is to pay those expenses out of the pockets of the judges of the districts into which these judges are called to render assistance. This is properly regarded as a hardship; and I am anxious that it should be remedied by the passage of this bill as speedily as possible. In the district from which I come a judge from an adjoining district is now holding court, and his expenses are paid out of the pocket of the judge of the district into which he has come.

Mr. REAGAN. Is it assumed that a circuit or district judge performing duty out of his district necessarily incurs more expense than one attending to his duties in his own district?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Most certainly. In such a case the judge leaves his family, is compelled to board at a hotel; and his expenses are necessarily much heavier than when he is at home, to say nothing of his traveling expenses.

A MEMBER. And the additional labor.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] allow me a word or two? The salaries of the Federal judges have all been fixed with reference to this liability to hold court occasionally in other districts than their own. As a matter of convenience nothing is more common than for the judges to exchange places, one sitting in the district of another. This has been our policy since the foundation of our judicial system, and especially since its present organization. I submit to the gentleman from Illinois that this is no time to begin an increase of salaries, for that is all there is in this proposition. This is certainly no time for increasing expenditures. There has been no special complaint heretofore in regard to the salaries of our Federal judges, either district or circuit; and now when some effort is being made to retrench the expenditures of the Government, I certainly do object to inaugurating this system of increase. There is no use in talking about diminishing expenses if every possible opportunity is to be seized upon to make an increase. I trust the House will not inaugurate this movement. It has been tried in this House time and again, and unsuccessfully. I trust it will fail now.

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, those of us who have observed the action of the courts of the several States know that there is nothing more common in the various State courts than the alternation of judges, they holding court for each other in the different districts; and so far as my knowledge goes no law has ever authorized an increase of pay to any State judge because he might sit in a court outside of his district. This service is a matter of courtesy, and also in some cases a matter of duty; but it has never been regarded as a reason for increase of pay; and until the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] I had not before heard that when a circuit or district judge of the United States performs duty for a time in another district than his own, he received additional compensation coming out of the salary of the judge in whose district he might sit. Certainly I have heard nothing of that kind; and I can scarcely think the practice exists to a considerable extent. It is certainly wrong in principle; and this is a wrong time to increase the salaries of judges or other officers. I do not say this in any party sense; but because the condition of the country is such that gentlemen receiving already competent salaries ought to be satisfied with them until the people shall be enabled to make an increase of salaries, if that should at any time be desirable.

Mr. FORT. Ought not this to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as it involves an appropriation of money out of the Treasury? I submit the point of order to the Chair, whether this bill does not go necessarily to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. MCCRARY. The point is made too late.

The SPEAKER. The point of order comes too late.

Mr. FORT. The previous question has not yet been ordered.

The SPEAKER. The bill has been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and the question now is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FORT. I trust that the gentleman will allow it to go there if he has an honest, straight bill and is not afraid of the committee.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of a good, honest, straight bill, and I regard this as a good, honest, straight bill. I admire exceedingly the persistent efforts of my friends here for economy. I join with them in that; but I do not regard this as any encroachment at all upon the principles of economy which these gentlemen seem so anxious to maintain at this particular time.

This bill will probably affect some three or four judicial districts in this country; only those districts that are overcrowded with business. The district from which I come is one. Probably the same thing may be maintained in regard to New York and other large cities where the dockets of our district courts are crowded. It will not maintain all over the country, for the reason that the business of the courts in other portions of the country is not so crowded as in these few places I have mentioned. Three or four months in the year only are occupied by these outside judges who come to the assistance of the resident judges; and the bill does not provide they shall receive $10 per day each, but that their expenses only shall be paid, not exceeding $10 per day. If he pays but $3 per day, then he will receive but $3. And it is very poor economy, it seems to me, to strike down a bill of this kind in the House when we may, if this bill does not pass, be compelled to provide for additional judges instead of these simple expenses. I will yield now to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. MCCRARY.]

Mr. MCCRARY. Mr. Speaker, the bill now before the House is entirely just, and I think it is very necessary. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is mistaken in saying that the salaries of the district judges were originally fixed with reference to the law which authorizes circuit judges to transfer the district judges from one district to another. The salaries of the district judges were fixed long before.

Mr. HOLMAN. As the gentleman very well knows, many of them have been re-adjusted since that time.

Mr. MCCRARY. There has been a law which allows a district judge to go from one district to another, but when the circuit system was adopted there was incorporated into that a provision which allowed the circuit judge or Supreme Court justice to require a district judge to go from one district to another to relieve the judge who might be overwhelmed with work.

Now, sir, the salaries of district judges in this country are in my judgment inadequate. They are certainly not as large as they ought to be with reference to the salaries of the circuit judges. But there is no proposition here to increase them. There are, however, a few districts, and they are districts in large cities, in which the district courts are overwhelmed with business. Take a district judge and send him one or two hundred miles from his residence; require him to live in the city of Chicago, city of New York, or city of Boston, as economically as he can live, and it is impossible for any of these district judges, upon the salaries they now receive, to carry out the law on this subject without a pecuniary sacrifice. Hence the result is as stated by my colleague on the committee from the Chicago district. When a district judge is ordered into the city of Chicago to hold court, the resident judge in order to get him to perform that duty without requiring from him a sacrifice pays his expense out of his own pocket. The district judges receive from three thousand to thirty-five hundred dollars a year throughout the country, and they cannot afford to discharge this duty and pay their own expenses. I say here if this provision is not made for these judges, either this or the next Congress will be compelled to erect a number of new districts and create a number of new judges in this country. Therefore, as a measure of economy, it will be better to pass the bill now before the House.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. My colleague and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] say that if this bill is not passed giving an opportunity to designate a judge to assist judges in certain districts to hold court, it will be necessary to create new districts and that it is a matter of economy to pay these judges $10 a day rather than create these new districts. Upon that I differ with them. I believe it is less expense to the people of the United States and of localities to have additional districts, because, as in the case of Illinois, if you drag jurors from the extreme limits of the State to the city of Chicago, if you drag witnesses there, if you pile up marshals' fees for the distances you have to take these witnesses and jurors, you will find a much larger expense to the people than by simply dividing the district and creating districts of sufficient size to accommodate the people.

If that is the object of the bill, and it seems to me one of the objects of the bill as stated here, I do not believe it is in the interest of economy. I believe it is far better that the district should be made up of a convenient size. And speaking on behalf of the people of Illinois as expressed by their Legislature twice, and as expressed by their Representatives here upon this floor, I feel warranted in saying that the people of that State prefer that there should be a new district to having the provisions of the bill detailing a judge from one point to hold a court at another point, with another court sitting there side by side, and paying him $10 a day.

Twice the Legislature of the State of Illinois have unanimously asked, in the interest of economy and the interests of the people, that an additional district should be created for that State. And their Representatives in this House have sought the passage of a bill carrying out the wishes of the people. Therefore I must oppose this bill if its object be to create additional expense in the distance that witnesses have to travel, in the distance that members of the bar and counsel have to travel to attend these courts, in the distance that the marshal has to travel and the jurors have to travel. If the object is to prevent the creation of a district that may hereafter be demanded and is now demanded for the convenience of the people, by providing that the court at Chicago, overburdened as it is stated to be, shall be relieved by detailing a judge there, I am opposed to the passage of the bill; and it will be difficult for the gentleman reporting the bill, or any member of the committee, or any member of the House, to show that it will be of any absolute accommodation to the people. It may reduce the amount to be paid out in the first instance from the Treasury, but it will not lessen the absolute cost and expense. It is a proposition that I had not expected would be presented at this time. And I think that my colleague, while he may represent the desire of the members of a court, the judge and the marshal, and perhaps some of the members of the bar there, and the people in the commercial city of Chicago, I say he does not represent the wishes of the people of Illinois in regard to the passage of that bill.

Mr. CAULFIELD. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has mistaken the bill that is before the House. He thinks that the bill before the House is the one that he has in his pocket, for the division of the district, I am now pleading for. The gentleman has either introduced or is about to introduce a bill for the division of this district in order that a new court may be created and a new judge appointed, involving great expense to the Government. I am not here for the purpose at this time of arguing that question. I am here now simply for the purpose of providing for the contingencies that occur previous to the adoption of his bill and the formation of a new district.

The judge from the adjoining district is now holding court as an assistant to Judge Blodgett, of Chicago, in the district in which Judge Blodgett is judge. Unless we provide that his expenses shall be paid while he is so holding court, his expenses must come out of the pocket of the incumbent judge. When the gentleman's bill comes up, if that bill is passed then the necessity for this particular bill in this particular district will be entirely obviated; and the passage of this bill at this time will have nothing to do whatever either with the passage or the defeat of the bill that the gentleman has in charge for the division of that district. I simply want to provide, if the gentleman's bill is passed, for the time that will occur between this and the passage of his bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If my colleague will allow me, I desire to say that I understood his argument to be, and I understood the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. MCCRARY] to argue, that this bill would prevent the necessity of creating any additional district.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I admit it will necessitate the passage of the bill of my colleague unless this is done, but this being done does not necessitate the defeat of my colleague's bill.

Mr. SPARKS. Will my colleague allow me to ask him how long this system has been going on?

Mr. CAULFIELD. It is provided for by law.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nine years ago.

Mr. SPARKS. Is not this a reciprocal or mutual arrangement by which each holds court for the other?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Of course.

Mr. SPARKS. Does my colleague know of any district judge in the United States that has ever resigned his office on account of the insufficiency of the salary or the overwork of the office?

Mr. CAULFIELD. My experience, Mr. Speaker, may not be as great as that of my colleague. I have never turned my attention to that question. Perhaps the gentleman himself may be able to inform the House on the subject better than I can.

Mr. SPARKS. I never heard of one who so resigned.

Mr. LYNDE. There is a law authorizing the payment of the expenses of district judges who are assigned to the district of New York, not to exceed $10 a day. I see no reason why the same law should not be extended to other districts where the same necessity of aid to the court exists. It is a peculiar hardship that the judge of the circuit court can require a district judge to go into another district for the purpose of disposing of the business of that district where the district judge is not able to dispose of it; and it is a peculiar hardship upon suitors, who are obliged to wait with a docket overloaded so that the local judge cannot dispose of it, that another judge cannot be sent to that district to dispose of that business; and the circuit judges at the present time have great hesitation in assigning any other judge to assist the local judge in disposing of his business because there is no law which will authorize that district judge to be paid his expenses while he is assisting the local judge. I believe that instead of creating additional expense it will actually lessen the expenses of these several courts that are now overburdened with business. Suits will be disposed of much more expeditiously; parties will be able to get their cases to a hearing; witnesses will not be detained as they now are detained; jurors will not be kept, as they are now kept, until the case can be disposed of by a local judge. Therefore I think it is a matter of economy that we should enable a circuit judge to call in a district judge to help to clear the dockets and to dispose of the calendars that are overburdened.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the previous question has not been called on this bill, and I move that it be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was put on Mr. Holman's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 99, noes 51.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the motion by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HEADS OF EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. HUNTON, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do not pass, the bill (H. R. No. 263) to provide that the heads of Executive Departments may occupy seats on the floor of the House of Representatives, and moved that the same be laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the motion by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS SOLD IN INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. HUNTON also, from the same committee, reported back, with a substitute, the bill (H. R. No. 18) for the relief of owners and purchasers of lands sold for direct taxes in insurrectionary States.

Mr. HUNTON. That bill is subject to the point of order, and I therefore move to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that the substitute be printed.

I will ask further, as it is a bill of some importance, that it be made a special order for the 16th day of February, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, not however to interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does not that bill require its first consideration in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The chair accepts the statement of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] on that point.

Mr. HOLMAN. It makes an appropriation, and of course it is subject to the point of order.

Mr. HUNTON. I have moved that the bill and substitute be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and made a special order for the 16th day of February.

Mr. HOLMAN. I presume the gentleman excepts reports from the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has proposed to except no report save that from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOLMAN. Reports from the Committee on Ways and Means ought to be excepted also.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to its being made a special order.

Mr. HOSKINS. I suggest to the gentleman from Virginia that he withdraw the latter part of his motion, making this a special order from day to day until disposed of, and confine it to one day.

Mr. HUNTON. If that will obviate the objection made, I will withdraw that part of my motion.

The SPEAKER. Then the motion now is that the bill be made a special order for the 16th day of February, and that alone.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to giving this bill any preference over others that may be referred to the committee.

The question was then taken on the motion to refer the bill and substitute (H. R. No. 1804) to the Committee of the Whole on the State of the Union, and order them to be printed, and it was agreed to.

COMMISSIONERS OF UNITED STATES COURTS.

Mr. LORD, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 721) to provide for the appointment of commissioners for taking affidavits, &c., for the courts of the United States, with a substitute.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the circuit courts of the United States may appoint commissioners, to be called "affidavit commissioners," who are hereby authorized to take affidavits, depositions, and verifications of pleadings to be read in the courts of the United States, but shall not possess the other powers conferred by statute upon commissioners of the circuit courts.

The substitute (H. R. No. 1803) was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have this bill explained a little. I do not see why the existing commissioners cannot perform this business with propriety.

Mr. LORD. The necessity of the bill is in this: At the last session of Congress notaries public were stricken out from the statute, so that notaries public cannot now take affidavits. And there was a good reason for striking them out. Notaries public are not under the control of the United States courts, and the power to take affidavits by them was sometimes abused. In the State of New York—and I understand the same to have been the case throughout the United States—persons had to travel forty or fifty miles for the purpose simply of making an affidavit. This bill provides simply that the circuit courts, composed of the circuit judge and district judges, may appoint commissioners at proper places for the purpose simply of taking affidavits.

Mr. HOAR. My question is why the commissioners now appointed by the judges—I think the judges of the Supreme Court still appoint commissioners——

Mr. LORD. The commissioners now appointed have power to make arrests, issue criminal process, and all that; and it might be very unfortunate to increase the number of officers with that power; we have already enough of them. The object of this is to locate at proper points where there are no commissioners as at present appointed commissioners to take affidavits simply. In the State where I live, in the city of Utica, there is a United States commissioner, and the people in that district have to travel forty or fifty miles in order to make affidavits before the commissioner. When the notaries public were recognized affidavits could be taken conveniently before them. But those officers are now abolished, and a man who wishes to make an affidavit simply must travel until he can find a United States commissioner before whom to make it. This bill is to provide commissioners to take affidavits merely; it will be a very great public convenience, and these officers will be directly under the control of the courts, while notaries public were not.

Mr. HOAR. I understand these commissioners are to take depositions, and are therefore to have the power of compelling the attendance of witnesses and to commit for contempt. It seems to me that it is of very questionable propriety to multiply these little United States officers with special authority. If a commissioner is needed for this purpose, the true way is to have an additional commissioner appointed by the United States court, who will be a person of character, known to the judge, and his discretion in the taking of the deposition will be likely to insure integrity.

Mr. LORD. It is not intended to give these commissioners any such power as the gentleman suggests. The intention is merely to give them power to take affidavits ex parte. If the word "depositions" in the bill will confer the authority upon these officers which the gentleman suggests, then I will consent to have that word stricken out, for the object is simply to give these officers power to take affidavits ex parte.

Mr. HOAR. The bill certainly is not what the gentleman explains the intention of the committee to be, because it gives these officers authority to take depositions, and that of course implies all the other authority I have suggested.

Mr. LORD. I will ask that the bill be again reported as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

That the circuit courts of the United States may appoint commissioners, to be called "affidavit commissioners," who are hereby authorized to take affidavits, depositions, and verifications of pleadings to be read in the courts of the United States, but shall not possess the other powers conferred by statute upon commissioners of the circuit courts.

Mr. LORD. I am willing that the word "depositions" shall be stricken out.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman will permit me a moment, I think there is a very serious objection to the policy which this bill proposes to inaugurate. There is no way in which imposition is more likely to be practiced upon the Government or upon the courts than in that class of cases where the testimony is taken and the proof is made by ex parte affidavits, by evidence taken for the purpose of prosecuting claims before the Departments of the Government. The only protection we have against the getting up of these bogus claims and verifying them by ex parte affidavits, in a great many cases, is in the character and integrity of the magistrate before whom they are taken. If a scamp and knave, who is getting up a bogus case, goes before him and the magistrate is a man of intelligence, character, and accustomed to administer justice and transact business, he will see through the thing at once. This bill proposes to appoint a person, without giving bond or having any considerable or respectable jurisdiction, whose sole power is simply to take a man's oath, and the result of that will be that the papers verified before this class of magistrates will derive no additional value whatever from the oath. It will be quite as well to undertake to say that in all that class of cases no oath shall be necessary, that the inscription verifying the papers shall be all that is required. I am opposed altogether to multiplying these petty United States officers.

Mr. LORD. I will give a very brief history of the necessity of such a measure as this. This bill was suggested by a state of things which exists in our State, and I have no doubt in other States of the Union. The circuit court now has the power to appoint at its will United States commissioners. Notaries public having been stricken out of the old law, a great pressure is made upon the circuit courts to appoint commissioners, those commissioners having full power to make arrests, issue criminal process, &c. The object of this bill is to authorize the appointment of commissioners by the circuit courts wherever it may be deemed necessary, with power simply to take affidavits ex parte. We have just as much assurance in respect to the appointment of affidavit commissioners of character and respectability as we have in regard to the other commissioners. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered, which was upon ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. LORD. To meet an objection of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] I have consented to amend the substitute by striking out the word "depositions."

The SPEAKER. This being a report from a committee, the gentleman has not himself the power to modify it; it will require unanimous consent.

Mr. POPPLETON. I object.

Mr. HOAR. I understood that the gentleman reporting the bill modified it in that way at the time he reported it, upon the suggestion then made. That was the understanding, I thought, of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not so understand. The gentleman could not on his own motion modify the bill, which is the work of the committee.

The bill was passed.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ACTIONS IN CASES OF DEATH FROM WRONGFUL ACTS, ETC.

Mr. LAWRENCE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 1210) authorizing actions in cases of death resulting from wrongful act, neglect, or default.

The bill was read. It provides, as amended, that whenever the death of a person shall be caused, in the District of Columbia, by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of any person or corporation, and the act, neglect, or default is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured, or if she be a married woman, her husband, either separately or together with her, to maintain an action and recover damages in respect thereof, then, and in every such case, the person who, or corporation which, would have been liable if death had not ensued shall be liable to an action for damages, notwithstanding the death of the person injured, and although the death shall have been caused under such circumstances as amount in law to a felony. But in no case is the recovery to exceed the sum of $5,000.

The second section provides that every such action shall be brought by and in the name of the personal representive of such deceased person, and within twelve calendar months after his or her death. The jury in any such action may award such damages as to it may seem fair and just, and may direct in what proportion they shall be distributed to the wife, husband, parent, or child of the deceased.

The third section enacts that the amount recovered in any such action shall, after the payment of costs and reasonable attorneys' fees, be paid to the wife, husband, parent, or child of the deceased in such proportion as the jury may have directed, or, if they have not directed, according to the statute of distributions, and shall be free from all debts and liabilities of the deceased; but if there be no wife, husband, parent, or child, the amount so received shall be assets in the hands of the personal representatives, to be disposed of according to law.

The fourth section provides that the rights of action under the act shall not determine, nor shall such actions, when brought, abate by the death of the defendant.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill is copied from a statute enacted by the Legislature of Virginia at the session of 1870-'71, (chapter 29, section 1, page 27,) and incorporated into the Code of Virginia, (edition of 1873, page 996, chapter 145, sections 7, 8, 9, 10.) The language is substantially that of Lord Campbell's act of 1846, which may be found copied into Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, page 353, section 292. There is no such law in this District. There is a law substantially similar in most of the States. I suppose there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like to make a single suggestion. I observe that in the first part of the second section it is required that all actions under this bill "shall be brought by and in the name of the personal representative of such deceased person." Would it not be well to add after the words "personal representative" the words "or heirs?"

Mr. LAWRENCE. It would be impossible to bring the action in the name of the heirs.

Mr. REAGAN. I am not familiar with the laws of this District; but I know that in a number of the States those words would be necessary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill provides for a distribution of the money among the heirs; so that those words are not necessary.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman reporting this bill to a single point. The bill, as I understand, is intended to provide that for damages which may have been inflicted upon a person there shall be a right of action notwithstanding his subsequent death. It is not designed to give a right of action in the nature of a penalty to the personal representatives of a person who has been killed; but it simply provides that if the act is such as would (if death had not ensued) have entitled the party injured to maintain the action, then the corporation or person shall be liable to an action for damages.

But suppose the person, after having been injured, lives twelve months or two years in pain and agony, and sustains by the injury an amount of damage for which $5,000 would be a wholly inadequate compensation. Take, for instance, the Shaw case, in Massachusetts, where by a railway accident a woman had both her arms taken off, besides being seriously injured in other respects, and recovered $22,500. Now this bill limits the right of action in all cases, if death ensues, to $5,000. I suppose what is intended is that the penalty for the death shall not exceed $5,000. It certainly cannot mean to imply that if a person sustains damages to the amount of $20,000, and then dies, the fact of death will diminish the right of compensation for the agony, or loss of limb, or anything else of that kind sustained during the person's life-time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. At common law, in the case put by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] the right of action would die with the person; but in such a case the action might be brought during the life-time of the party; then the limitation imposed by this bill would not apply.

I was in favor of fixing the amount named in the bill at $10,000, but the committee thought $5,000 sufficient; and that is the amount fixed in many of the States. There must be some limitation. This is precisely in accordance with the British statute.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir; it does not conform to the British statute. This bill jumbles together two things wholly distinct and separate. It is true that for injuries which a person might sustain by the wrongdoing of another, in body, in mind, or in estate, the right of action at common law would expire with the death of the person injured; but there is no American jurisdiction in which that principle of the common law has not been long ago repealed; and for injuries which a person dying suffered in his life-time his executor or administrator may sustain an action without regard to the death of the party. But the fact of death is not taken into account as affecting or increasing the damages.

A man may live in agony for twenty-four hours, and for those twenty-four hours of agony his personal representatives after his death may maintain an action, as he might have done in his life-time. The compensation to be awarded to the widow or next of kin, to the executor or administrator, for the fact of his death is an altogether different and separate thing. For that no State in this country and no tribunal in England gave a right of action until Lord Campbell's act, which gave a right of action not exceeding a certain limit; and some of the statutes of this country have given also a right of action, usually not exceeding $5,000.

Now, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has taken those two things and mixed them together, providing that where a man sustains an injury there may be a right of action for that injury notwithstanding his death, and that for the injury his next of kin or his legal representatives shall in no case recover more than $5,000. Thus this bill, instead of enlarging, diminishes and cuts off the right of action. Now, I wish the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] would allow the bill to be recommitted and reported again to-morrow morning.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until to-morrow morning.

VESSELS OWNED BY CITIZENS.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 1805) to encourage the conduct of commerce in vessels owned by citizens of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. LUCKEY his Private Secretary; and likewise the announcement that the President had on February 1, 1876, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 626) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to naturalization; and

An act (H. R. No. 1208) to amend the Revised Statutes touching vice-consul generals.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON. I move that the rules be suspended and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of taking up and considering the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOSKINS in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, a bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will be reported in full for information.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the Committee on Appropriations charged with reporting this bill to the House it may be proper that I should make a few remarks in explanation of what the committee has done. There is accompanying it, however, so full and exhaustive a report as to make it unnecessary that I should protract my remarks to any considerable length.

At the first meeting of the Committee on Appropriations the question came up informally whether we would embark upon a line of retrenchment and reform or whether we should be guided by the landmarks which had governed and controlled this House in its appropriations for the last few years. So soon as the question was sprung we had an expression of opinion, I believe, from every member of that committee, and, without a single dissenting voice, we came to the conclusion that it was our mission, as far as the limit of our power would allow, to retrench and reduce the expenditures of the Government in every department which came properly under our consideration. There is, therefore, no difference of opinion on the general question of the reduction of the expenditures of the Government, although we did not all agree, as it could not be supposed we would, upon the minutiæ of this or any other bill reported to the House. The differences, however, between us are small, and I apprehend before we get through we will be enabled to come together and pass this bill without a single dissenting voice.

It may be proper, Mr. Chairman, to state the reasons why we considered it necessary to embark in the work of retrenchment. We cannot cast our eyes to any portion of this country and view the pecuniary circumstances and surroundings of our people without being fully convinced and understanding that it is necessary we should do something for the relief of an overburdened people. I do not know how it may be in other sections of the country except as I see by the reports in the newspapers, but for my own section I know the people there are so overtaxed and so overburdened with debt that it is almost impossible for them in many instances to obtain even the common necessaries of life. Why, sir, the war which took place (and I allude to it now not for the purpose of getting up any discussion in reference to its merits or demerits upon the one side or the other) has left the people of the South, as is well known, in a most embarrassed condition in a pecuniary way. In all other wars which have taken place that which was property at the beginning of the war remained property at the close, and it belonged either to the victors or the vanquished; so that a man, although he had lost his estate, still had an opportunity to re-acquire it. When the war closed, however, our slaves had all been set at liberty, and we had lost absolutely, just as fully and entirely, $400,000,000, as if it had been consumed by fire. We do not regret the result of the war so far as that matter is concerned. I state here on my veracity that if by my fiat to-day I could restore that institution I would not do it. But I simply speak of it as a fact that, by the loss of that property, we were impoverished to an extent that no man who has not thought on the subject can appreciate.

In the South the number of slaves a man owned constituted his wealth. You never heard the question asked when you came to inquire about a man's fortune as to the number of acres of land he owned, for that was a mere adjunct, as it were; but the question was, How many hands does he work? The wealth of the South was in the colored population of that section. Now, sir, that has been stricken down, and again I wish to repeat that there is no man in the South who would desire to restore that institution if he had it in his power to do so.

This is not all. There are other causes for our poverty and our distress. One of them is the fact that we have not had home rulers; that we have been governed and controlled by a set of men who, like the worthless drift-wood that lies rotting upon the banks of a stream, at the flood-tide of reconstruction was gathered up and precipitated upon us. These men came among us for no other purpose than for spoils; and they were not scrupulous as to the means by which they obtained them. We have been controlled by them. They have manipulated the Legislatures of our States, because they have been in the ascendency in several of them; and the consequence has been that we were overburdened with taxes, our money extorted from us unjustly, and we are left in such condition that to-day we are scarcely able to meet the taxes levied upon our real estate.

Those of you who represent constituencies in a better condition, you men in easy circumstances yourselves, could you stand, as I have stood, at the door of the court-house on the day when a homestead was advertised for sale, and could you look into the pallid and anxious countenance of the man whose home was about to be bid off by the tax-gatherer, you would have seen that the hammer, as it fell, smote the very heart of that man, crushing out his hopes and his energy. You would then begin to understand why the people of the South come here to ask for retrenchment in the expenses of the Government.

Why, sir, if this state of things progresses as it has been doing for some time, the real estate of my country will soon be all in the hands of a few men who have gone there with money to be used in this way, or it will have gone to the Government for taxes. Now, sir, this is another of the causes why I, in common with all who represent the Southern States, feel that it is necessary that we do something to relieve our people. We made pledges to them when on the stump. We then declared that we were in favor of reform. And, sir, are we to make these promises to the ear to be broken to the heart? Is it not tampering with the hopes of those who have generously confided in us? "Ease will recant vows made in pain as violent and void," wrote a distinguished author, but we can plead no such justification as Representatives upon this floor.

I know, sir, that when we get into the atmosphere of Washington we are too prone to forget those we left behind. We come here and walk or ride upon these magnificent streets; we go to these splendid entertainments and see the gorgeous dressing there indulged in; we draw our salaries and spend them at will, and seem to forget that there is poverty at home, and that we made pledges of reform which we are not now prepared to redeem. Again, it is well known to all gentlemen familiar with the South that our system of labor has been broken up. There are no means now of controlling our laborers; for they are, to all intents and purposes, in several of the States and have been our masters in the matter of labor as well as in politics. Many of the lands that were once beautiful plantations are now neglected and growing up in sedge-grass because of the fact that we cannot control the labor that is necessary to the cultivation of those lands.

The consequence is that where wealth and refinement once made their home, poverty and depression now hold undisputed sway.

Well, sir, this is a brief sketch of the condition of the people of portions of the South. Now, let me turn to the North, and ask if you have not troubles not altogether unlike our own, and in which you sympathize with us? What mean these raids that are taking place in States that regard themselves as so much better off than the Southern States? Why was it in the grand old State of Pennsylvania last summer that you saw men congregated together and marching through the land demanding bread or work?

It is very well known we were never a manufacturing people, that we bought very nearly everything we consumed, everything that we wore, and even much that we ate from other sections of the country. We were a cotton-raising people. We confined ourselves to that staple which commanded money in any market, being one of the necessities the world cannot do without. We bought from the North and West their manufactured articles, their iron, coal, mules, horses, pork, and grain. Therefore, when you see that we are suffering general depression in the whole South, you see also that it extends beyond the mere geographical limits of the Southern States. Why, sir, a gentleman from Ohio told me yesterday on this floor that in a town in his district a crowd of several hundred persons had gathered and demanded bread or work. What means this if not general depression all through the land? If your people do not sympathize with ours in these sufferings, what mean these gatherings North and these demands for bread? Why, sir, we are members of the same body politic; we are so united by ties of interest that it is utterly impossible to touch one portion of the country and do it an injury without that injury vibrating to the very circumference of the Union. We are so wrapt up in common interests, there is such an interchange of commodities between us, that you cannot injure one section without injuring the other. Why is it, sir, that the iron founderies of Pennsylvania are languishing to-day? Why is it that your railroad iron finds no market? Go to New York and you will find the goods we once purchased absolutely enveloped in dust and wearing out upon their shelves, and why? It is simply because the people of the South are not able to buy the goods we used to buy. We used to spend our money with liberal hands in the purchase of these goods, and now your railroad iron is unsold, your dry goods remain on the shelves of the merchants, and a thousand other interests are affected by the fact that we are straitened in pecuniary matters in the Southern States.

These potent reasons, with many others, induce the Committee on Appropriations to look to retrenchment and reform, that we might alleviate a distressed and suffering people in every section of the Union so far as we can do so. I want to say here, while it occurs to me, that I am no sectional man when it comes to legislation in this Hall. In voting on political questions I have my own political views, but, sir, when I took my seat here and took the oath to support the Constitution of my country, my purpose and object were to do justice to every section. I have no bitterness in my heart, nor do I believe that these Representatives for the South have any in theirs toward the people of the North. Let me say that, if there is any gentleman here who entertains such feelings, your people do not sympathize with you, nor do my people.

During my canvass last summer, when in my feeble way I undertook to describe the visit made by southern troops to Boston to celebrate the centennial of Bunker Hill, when I stated that while those troops were marching through the streets of Boston they paused and reversed arms and a committee appointed for that purpose quietly marched out with an immense bouquet and laid it upon the monument erected to the Union dead, and when I described to them how the handkerchiefs of the ladies were waved in the air, how cheers broke forth from the men, I saw the tears trickle down the furrowed cheeks of my people. I saw old ladies bury their faces in their handkerchiefs and weep for very joy that union was restored. And now I say again we have a great and holy work to accomplish, and if we do not accomplish that work woe be to the man who shall throw himself in the way of it.

Sir, when we came here at the commencement of this Congress we found an exhausted Treasury, our currency depreciated; we found everywhere a want of confidence; and the mission, the great duty, of this House is to restore confidence in the currency, to bring us back to the halcyon days when no more money was gathered from the people than was necessary for the economical administration of the Government, when there was no wasteful extravagance, and when there were no offices created for the benefit of office-holders, and when all were willing to receive what was necessary to give them a decent support, no matter what position under the Government they might occupy. The committee found upon investigation that we have an unnecessary number of officers, both domestic and foreign. This wrong had grown up in the flush times of the war, when plenty of paper money was issued and every one had it in abundance, when overwhelming fortunes were made, when extravagance prevailed everywhere. This system of making offices for the benefit of office-holders sprang up at this point of our history.

Sir, under our system of government offices are not created for the benefit of the office-holders, but for the public good; and whenever they fail to answer that end or are not necessary to the accomplishment of that purpose, then it becomes necessary that we as faithful guardians of the public interest shall abolish those offices and turn out all sinecure office-holders. I have no doubt that we shall hear wails from many of these. There will be individuals who will talk to every Congressman who will give them ear of their sorrows and troubles. To these complaints we can give no heed, as it is not the business of Congress to provide for chronic office-holders. Their feeble cries are swallowed up in the general wail that comes from the hearts of a suffering people.

It is not the business of Congress The Government was not instituted to take care of the few at the expense of the many. Has it come to this, that we are bound to make large appropriations in order to keep men in position and surround them with easy circumstances at the expense of the hard-working people of the country? When I say this, I do not say it with a view of appealing to that class of people; for they demand nothing but to be let alone; to have the hands of Government officials kept out of their pockets, except for necessary expenditures; to be permitted to cultivate the soil and to reap the fruits of their labor. But when you make a host of officers and give them high salaries in order that they may be clothed in purple and fine linen and fare sumptuously every day, you are doing injustice to your constituencies.

The salaries are too large; they have grown out of all proportion to what they were in the better days of the Republic, if I may so speak; and I hope no gentleman will take offense at the remark, for I think we have seen better days than those now upon us. In days gone by I find that we used to have as foreign ministers such men in 1841 as Edward Everett, minister to England; General Cass to France; Mr. Wheaton, the eminent author on international law, to Prussia; Mr. Jenifer, of Maryland, to Austria. They were entirely satisfied with the salaries they then received: $9,000 a year. It is true that for the first year they received an outfit of $9,000.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will permit me to say that I have heard Edward Everett make the most bitter complaints of the manner in which he had to appear at the court to which he had been sent to represent the United States.

Mr. SINGLETON. Very well; the gentleman was better acquainted with Mr. Everett than myself. I have no private sources of information upon that subject; I have never seen anything of that kind in print.

Mr. HOAR. It was in a public address that he made the complaint.

Mr. SINGLETON. It has escaped my attention altogether. At any rate our ministers then did not make any formal demand upon Congress for more pay; no effort was made that I am aware of to raise their salaries. Some gentlemen may say that they received an outfit of $9,000; that is true. But make your calculation: $9,000 salary and $9,000 outfit make $18,000 for the first year. Suppose the minister remains at his post for two years, he will have received $27,000, or at the rate of $13,500 a year. We propose by this bill to give them $14,000 a year. Suppose the minister shall remain there throughout an administration, four years, he will have received $45,000, or $11,250 a year, even counting in the outfit.

Our ministers then, as far as we know, always managed to appear respectably and were honored representatives of their country. I never heard of any of them writing treatises upon the game of draw poker; I never heard that they engaged in dealing in stocks of the Emma Mine Company or anything of that sort. They were gentlemen of the highest order of respectability; they were sans peur et sans reproche as ministers representing our Republic.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman state what the pay of those ministers were fixed at in 1855 by a democratic Congress?

Mr. SINGLETON. I am coming to that.

Mr. GARFIELD. And before the gentleman leaves the point he has just been making, I hope he will also state that they not only received an outfit when going out but an infit of half the amount when coming home.

Mr. SINGLETON. There was no law for it.

Mr. GARFIELD. That was the law at the time.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not the law.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is not now.

Mr. RANDALL. It was not the practice, if you please.

Mr. GARFIELD. It was the practice, and not contrary to law

Mr. SINGLETON. I am not old enough to know all about what the practices were then.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to make that statement in his remarks.

Mr. SINGLETON. There is no law for it, so far as I have been able to find out. There is another thing worthy of mention; at that time, so far as my recollection now serves me, there was no money allowed to the appointed minister for one month, which he now spends at home to receive his instructions and get ready for the mission. Now the salary as minister is permitted to run for one month before he leaves the United States, during which time he remains in the city of Washington to receive his instructions. And when his term of service expires, when he either chooses to resign or is recalled from his position, he is entitled to one month's salary, on an average, in order to get home again. I do not think that was the law at the time above referred to. If gentlemen can find it I shall be very glad to see it.

Leave of absence is now granted for two months and during that time the officer next in position, the secretary of legation, receives one-half of the amount of the salary of the minister, while the minister for sixty days is drawing the full amount of the $17,500 a year.

Mr. KASSON. The custom and the right were for the minister to draw his salary from the issuance of the commission, and the practice the gentleman refers to is a restriction upon the old practice.

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes; and they used to go to their work at once.

Mr. KASSON. I know of one or two instances where a man remained for months in the United States after his commission was issued to him, drawing his full salary all of the time.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; but those abuses this bill will correct.

Mr. KASSON. That abuse was under the administration of the gentleman's own party.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not care; we will correct those abuses wherever we find them.

Mr. KASSON. In some instances men drew the outfit and never actually entered upon the service.

Mr. SINGLETON. That may be so for all I know; but it was to correct just such abuses that the law was changed, so that no outfit was allowed.

O, sir, I expect the gentlemen on that side of the House to make opposition to this bill; we look for it as a matter of course. I know that the contrast which we intend to present to the country before this Congress is over, if the Senate will concur with us, will be painful for gentlemen on the other side to look upon. When they see that we have made a reduction of from thirty to fifty million dollars annually in the expenses of this Government without impairing the efficiency of the service, it will be a painful spectacle for gentlemen to contemplate, now that the presidential election is approaching. We except nothing else but opposition; but we intend to "fight it out upon that line."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I am sincerely desirous to vote for any legitimate measure of retrenchment and reform; and I presume the matter to which I now ask the gentleman's attention is provided for in the bill, but I fail to discover it. I observe the bill, as reported, proposes, commencing at line 85, to appropriate for the salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks, the gross sum of $230,400. This sum is to be paid out among one hundred and twenty-six consuls, vice-consuls, and commercial agents; but I fail to discover anywhere in the bill any provision for determining how much is to be paid to any one of these officers at any one of these places.

Mr. RANDALL. That is regulated by classes.

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman will find on examination that there is a classification of these officers, and the amount to be paid to those in each class is given at the head of each classification.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Is it to be found in the present bill or in the Revised Statutes?

Mr. RANDALL. A provision of the Revised Statutes fixes the pay by classes. The second class of officers in this bill receive, for instance, $3,500 each; and they run down by gradations of $500 till they reach the seventh class, for which the pay is $1,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. If the gentleman will turn to the act passed two or three years ago he will find the classification giving the amounts which those of each class are to receive. When we proceed to consider this bill by paragraphs, we shall give explanations which I hope will be satisfactory to every man in the House.

Before concluding these desultory remarks it may be proper for me to state the manner in which we propose to make this reform.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would be glad if the gentleman would refer me to the provision of law regulating the point I have suggested. I fail to find it in the Revised Statutes, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. RANDALL. I can point it out to the gentleman.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the gentleman will take the bill and examine it to his heart's content. If he cannot understand it, I cannot help it; it is not my business to hunt up the law for him.

I will state our manner of proceeding. We have found that there were many representatives of our Government at points of very little commercial importance and really rendering no service to the country. We have called to our aid all the assistance we could get. We have had before us gentlemen who have visited all these consulates, and we have put inquiries to them in order to obtain all the information that they possessed upon the subject. We have talked with the Secretary of State. In fact from every source we have sought all the information that was to be had. Where we have found it unnecessary to continue a consulate we have proposed to abolish the office, and have declined to report an appropriation to pay the consul.

Again, we found that we were paying more than we should pay to some of these officers; we have reduced salaries; we have put officers into a lower classification with smaller salaries. Where we have found the "contingent expenses" too great, as they have assuredly been in many instances, as we shall be able to demonstrate as we proceed with the consideration of the bill, we have cut down these contingent expenses. By these means we have been enabled to reduce the appropriations under this bill, if the House shall adopt it as reported, about $450,000 below the appropriations of last year.

Last year the appropriation was about $1,300,000 in round numbers, and we have reduced that about $450,000, making about 33⅓ per cent. of reduction on the estimate.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I will be glad to be again permitted to say that I acknowledge my ignorance in reference to this subject. I probably am obnoxious to the charge made, but still I am unable to find any provision in the statutes of 1874 making the classification specified. I should be glad to be referred to where I can find it.

Mr. SINGLETON. In volume 18 of the Statutes at Large.

Mr. HOLMAN. My colleague will find it in the Statutes at Large.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I wish to know where it is before I am called upon to vote on this question. I am here to learn, and am not ashamed to ask for information until I get it.

Mr. SINGLETON. Now, sir, in the course we have taken, as I remarked a few minutes since, we do not expect to escape censure. The wounded pigeon will flutter, and we expect to see fluttering among the men whose heads have been taken off and among their friends as well as among those who have favorites abroad and who dislike very much to see their salaries reduced or their offices abolished. But as I said in the beginning, we have got a higher duty to perform than all this. We owe it to the country, which we profess to love and which we are sent here to represent, to bring it out of its present condition of bankruptcy if it be possible for us to do this.

Now, Mr. Chairman, what are the facts of the case? We are paying about $98,000,000 interest on the public debt. It is said that the ordinary (so called, but to my mind extraordinary) expenses of this Government for the last year have been $175,000,000. What necessity was there for this? In 1860, I believe, the expenditures of the Government were about $63,000,000. How does it happen that what are termed ordinary expenditures of the Government have run up to $175,000,000? It is all on account of the extravagance which is indulged in giving high salaries to representatives abroad, as well as like extravagances in every other department of the Government. It is this wasteful extravagance in the expenditure of the people's money that we must stop.

In reply to a question put to me by the gentleman from Iowa I will say I do not care under what administration these salaries were fixed at $17,500. I believe it was under a democratic administration. But, granting that to be so, we ought not to forget that the country is now embarrassed and we are in a condition where we must retrench. Such being the condition of the country, is it any good reason with the gentleman, as it certainly is not with me, because these salaries were fixed at $17,500 under a democratic administration that we should continue them at the same rate?

Mr. KASSON. If I do not interrupt the gentleman from Mississippi, I wish to call his attention to the real point involved here as I see it. He will find, so far as I am concerned, and many others on this side of the House, that we desire to reduce the expenditures wherever the circumstances authorize it, consistently with the interest and honor of the country. And I may be permitted to say, I regret that any political aspect shall be given to the diplomatic appropriation bill. What I wished to call his attention to was that this thing was done by a democratic administration, and it was found necessary at a time when expenses were necessarily not much over 80 or 75 per cent. of what they now are. At some of the capitals and places where it was found necessary, twenty years ago exactly, by a Congress that was supposed to be under no strong inclination to swell salaries beyond the amount needed, it was found necessary to fix them at those figures. The point is that we all know, those who have inquired into the subject, that the expenses at these capitals now are much greater than they were then. What I wish is ask whether the Committee on Appropriations had found such reduction in living at these foreign capitals as would justify them in reducing the salaries which were fixed twenty years ago, or whether this is a mode adopted by the committee of imposing a tax upon the men who happen to be abroad representing the Government, in the nature of an income tax upon their salaries? That is the way it strikes me in the absence of any proof where the cost of living is less now than it was twenty years ago. I hope I have made myself understood.

Mr. SINGLETON. Certainly, and I have only this response to make to the gentleman, that we were then rich and out of debt..

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will allow me to say after that time we put a twenty million loan upon the market, and sold it at a heavy discount to supply the wants of the Treasury.

Mr. SINGLETON. We are now poor and overburdened with debt, and the very same principle which is good in relation to any man's private affairs will apply to the expenditures of the Government of the United States. You as the head of a family, or I as the head of a family, when we are outliving our income, finding our estate is being encumbered or already encumbered, and laboring to pay the interest on the debt, would we not say to the members of our household, if we were men of ordinary discretion, "You must curtail your expenditures, for I must pay this debt; I must get clear of this enormous amount of interest I am paying on my obligation." Each member of that household, therefore, would be under the necessity of curtailing his respective expenses. So it is with the Government. We owe an immense debt. How are we to pay that debt, if we go on spending all the money we can raise in paying the interest, and the extravagant expenses of this Government? When do you propose to get out of debt? You seem to be anxious now to keep up the public credit. You clamor for it day after day upon this floor. And how are you to do it? You are making no provision for the liquidation of your bonds when they fall due. We are bound to do this as wise men, as faithful Representatives. I do not care under what administration the salaries may have been raised. There is no sanctity about the action of any class of politicians in this country, if we find they have taken a course inimical to the interests of the whole mass of the people.

The other day a gentleman on this floor, my distinguished friend from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] indulged in a tirade against this committee which I think did not do much credit to the gentleman. He charged that we were cowardly, that we were ignorant. Well, sir, that may be so; but I venture the assertion that there is not a man upon that committee who is not the peer of that gentleman in point of intelligence and moral courage. Such charges as these ought not to be made against the functionaries of this House. We have been selected, whether wisely or not, by the Speaker for the purpose of discharging certain duties, and I say that the gentleman only shoots an arrow that will recoil upon his own head when he undertakes to attack that committee wholesale as he did.

And there is my handsome friend from Maine—O, you need not [addressing Mr. HALE] look beyond yourself for the man [laughter]—who the other day, because my friend from New York [Mr. COX] was gaffing him unmercifully, got out of temper and pitched into the South with a vim, declaring we were here with immense amounts of claims demanding payment from the Government.

Did you intend when you established your Court of Claims that we should come and present just and legitimate claims for settlement? Have you not the whole control of that court? Is not every man appointed upon it of your own party? Why then do you complain when you invite us to present these claims, because we do your bidding and ask that they may be examined into and allowed if just.

"O," but you say, "they are presented to the House." What is your business but to watch these claims, and when you find one about to be passed that is improper, what is your duty but to see that that claim does not pass; that you expose it, and secure a vote against it in Congress? Now, sir, I am tired of this thing of your daily raids upon the South. I am from the South, and am a southern man every inch of me, from the crown of my head to the sole of my foot. But I have not come here for the purpose of exciting discord in this body. I have come for the purposes of peace. I want peace, and I wish myself and my constituents to be treated as other gentlemen and other constituencies are treated upon this floor. I do not want you when you get yourselves a little ruffled in temper to turn your batteries upon the South. It is a cheap sort of courage, let me say to gentlemen. We are here, as it were, bound; we are under a bond to keep the peace. Everybody knows it, and we feel it. When you indulge in such remarks you are not showing your manhood in a way that is at all creditable to you.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask him whether he heard a gentleman from the South say on this floor, with the applause of the men who sat all around him, that we had broken every oath we ever took?

Mr. SINGLETON. You had better hold that gentleman responsible for it. I am not responsible.

Mr. HOAR. Did you hear that statement made?

Mr. SINGLETON. I believe I heard something of that sort.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I wish to say that the gentleman from Georgia, in making that remark, alluded to the fanatics and "higher-law" men of the North, and not to the republican party.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think the gentleman from Georgia disclaimed any purpose to reflect on the masses of the people of the North. They are not with you. Their hearts are not in the war of attack upon the South in which you have been engaged since the meeting of this Congress. They do not show it in their meetings, you do not hear of it at any of their public gatherings. There is no evidence that their sympathies are with you. I hope from this time forward we will meet as brethren and as equals. I feel as long as I am a member of this body that I am the equal of the representative of any other constituency, if not in intellect at least in rights and privileges. I claim nothing for myself that I do not accord to others, and I hope that I will at least be regarded as representing a people brave, honorable, and true.

We did have a war of sections; but we were just as honest in the opinions we entertained as your people were, and I believe they give us credit for it. But I am not going back to that matter. We submitted the question to the arbitrament of arms. Your numbers and prowess overcame us, though we were brave as yourselves; and when we surrendered we did it in good faith; we did it like men who intended to stand to the pledges they made. You will find that while I hold a seat in this Congress I shall never unnecessarily or intentionally wound the sensibilities of any man who sits on the opposite side of the House. My associations with gentlemen on that side of the House are pleasant. I know many people in the North; I admire them because I know that many of them are true and honorable. They do not go with you when you undertake to bring sectional issues into this House for the purpose of stirring up discord and to make capital for the approaching presidential campaign. They see through this thin disguise; and when you are attempting to stir up strife between different sections of the country they understand the whole movement. I do not know how many presidential aspirants you have on that side of the House; but they are budding out pretty rapidly and pursue the course most likely to make capital for themselves, regardless of the public interests.

Now, sir, let us be done with this. I came here as your brother; I came here as your friend; I came here with the purpose of promoting the interests of my own people and yours. I shall strive in all my acts to build up the ruined South. I want you before this Congress adjourns to assist me in two or three schemes directed to that end, which I believe you will do, because your own interests imperatively demand such a course. I want to build up the Mississippi levees and reclaim its alluvial soil, which will prove a more fruitful source of wealth to the United States than the Black Hills of the Territories or the mines of California, because it is from this inexhaustible soil of the delta of the Mississippi River that we can raise 7,000,000 bales of cotton a year if properly protected from overflow. We expect to ask a small sum for this work that will develop this alluvial basin and enable us to purchase from you the goods we formerly purchased and contribute largely to the expenses of the Government.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman state what the other schemes are that people desire?

Mr. SINGLETON. I will. I am not afraid to tell it anywherere. Another one is a Pacific railroad.

Mr. HALE. The Southern Pacific Railroad?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes; and then again I want the jetty system carried out at New Orleans which promises to admit vessels of the largest tonnage up to the wharves in that city. And if we can get these things accomplished you will find the South blossoming like the rose. You will find sources of wealth to you and the whole country that you never dreamed of.

Mr. HALE. Is not the refunding of the cotton tax another object which the gentleman desires?

Mr. SINGLETON. Well, I do not propose to discuss that now. When the proposition comes before the House I will give my views upon it.

Mr. WILLIS. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Maine that the democratic party do not propose to help the South by building a Pacific railroad. The republican party may do so if they feel disposed; but, so far as we are concerned, we do not intend to indulge in any subsidies, the republican example to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. HALE. I wanted the gentleman to state as a representative of the southern democracy what the democratic party, of which it constitutes a large portion, expect to carry before Congress adjourns? I thank him for the candor with which he has answered my question and the monition he has given the country.

Mr. SINGLETON. I stated that I had three schemes in view.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Maine by what authority he says that the gentleman from Mississippi is the representative of the southern democracy here?

Mr. HALE. I did it because, although it was not an assumption on the part of the gentleman from Mississippi, for he is not an assuming man, but he claims to state for the southern people as their representative, speaking distinctly for them, complaining of the republican party, that they required certain schemes, and I used his words, that the South wished to accomplish before Congress adjourns. I wished to know what they were, and I thank the gentleman again for the monition he has given to the country, and especially does the gentleman from Mississippi represent the southern people, because he has been selected as one of their representatives on the Money Committee of the House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That may be all so; but I deny the right of the gentleman from Maine to designate him as the representative of the southern democracy.

Mr. HOLMAN. The democratic party is neither for the Southern Pacific Railroad nor for refunding the cotton tax.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield for these interruptions?

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, I am one of the best-natured men you ever knew in your life, and I yield, of course.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I deny the right of the gentleman from Maine or any other gentleman on that side of the floor to designate the gentleman from Mississippi or any other gentleman as the representative man of the southern democracy on this floor.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. He is one of them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am not a member of the southern democracy; I am a member of the national democracy.

Mr. SINGLETON. Exactly.

Mr. DOUGLAS. And we have come here to reform the abuses of the Government.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] is a little less frank than the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] for he says that he is not prepared to state what he may desire to bring before Congress before this session is closed. The gentleman from Mississippi is more frank, and has given us a monition of what we may expect from that section.

Mr. SINGLETON. O, no.

Mr. HALE. I did not expect that a simple question from me would have stirred up such a hornet's nest as this. My friend from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who opposes the project of the Southern Pacific Railroad, wants this discussion stopped; I do not wonder at it. But he must not call me to account for announcing that one of these schemes is the Southern Pacific Railroad; he must settle that matter with the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. HOLMAN. The honorable gentleman from Mississippi, a distinguished representative from the South, expressed himself in favor of the Southern Pacific Railroad and in favor of the Government repairing and constructing the southern levees. Is not that all?

Mr. HALE. That was not all.

Mr. HOLMAN. And also in favor of the proposition that the Government shall expend money for the improvement or construction or repair of the Mississippi levees and jetties. Does not the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] know that the gentleman from Mississippi is expressing simply his own individual views upon that subject, and that time and again the democratic party in this House has opposed all those measures and will continue to do so?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman ask me what I know about that?

Mr. SINGLETON. Gentlemen, I hope you will get through after a while. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman from Indiana want me to answer his question?

Mr. HOLMAN. It is not necessary for the gentleman to state what we all know so well.

Mr. HALE. I expect that the gentleman will be outvoted by his own party.

Mr. BLOUNT. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to allow me a moment.

Mr. SINGLETON. Surely.

Mr. BLOUNT. I desire to say this in reply to what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has said in reference to the desire of the people of the South for a Southern Pacific railroad. The gentleman seems not to be able to appreciate the course of my friend from Virginia [Mr. DOUGLAS] in not announcing positively how he stands upon measures that may hereafter come up for consideration in this House. I say to him that my purpose is not to discuss questions here before I have had an opportunity of examining them. When we have had an opportunity to consider and examine these questions, then it will be decorous for me to take a position upon them. We are not here now as commissioners to take testimony, as the gentleman from Maine seems to be doing for his own particular party purposes. We occupy a much higher rank than that. I think when the time comes the gentleman will find that the South will do whatever is right and proper, and that the country will deem our course right in not announcing what we will do on measures not yet up for consideration.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair deems it his duty to inform the gentleman from Mississippi that he has but five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. SINGLETON. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the democracy of this House ought to be held responsible for their acts. When they shall recommend legislation and carry it into effect it will be time enough for the other side to hold us responsible, and not till then.

Mr. SINGLETON. I suppose, as I am a very small man, gentlemen may not consider me a representative of my party.

Mr. HALE. I know that the party has no better representative.

Mr. SINGLETON. I said that I expected to ask you to vote for certain measures. I did not speak for anybody on this side of the House; I simply gave utterance to my own views. It is not for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to hold anybody else responsible for what I say. I am but an insignificant member of this body, and do not desire to be a leader in my party, or to represent any but the constituents who sent me here. I hope the gentleman is satisfied.

I did not suppose I was to stir up such a trouble on the republican side of the House when I took the floor, and I have got so completely off the line of my argument by all these interruptions that I do not believe I shall be able to get fairly started again. [Laughter.] I am not so sure but that was the purpose and intention of some of my worthy friends over there when they broke in upon my remarks.

Mr. HALE. O, no; that is unkind.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think I have said enough at present touching this bill. I have a few remarks prepared to which I will not attempt to give expression.

Mr. HOAR. We will extend your time if you want.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will be given all the time he requires, for he has been interrupted so much.

Mr. SINGLETON. O, no! No, I do not ask it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It is a selfish courtesy in you to propose to extend his time. You wish to ask him a few more questions in the hope that by the frankness of his answers you may get something that you can take advantage of and carry back to your district.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, a word more and I am done. For twenty years past, more than half a generation, the brotherhood of States inaugurated by our fathers, built up and cemented by their blood, has been disturbed by the agitation of the question of African slavery and its adjuncts. In the conflict of opinion and clash of arms that institution has perished forever. The Constitution has been amended, fully guarding against its re-establishment. Everywhere the freedom of the slave has been acknowledged, and in no portion of this country more fully than in the South. Like other great questions it has had its day, and it is now time that the agitation growing out of it should cease, and that there should supervene a better state of feelings between the sections of this country. I grant you, sir, that, reared under a form of government like ours, where independence of thought and individual opinion have ever been encouraged, it may not be deemed strange that there should have arisen differences of opinion upon grave questions of domestic policy, but the strange part of it is that, with all the cohesive powers of American citizenship, with all the memories of a common revolutionary struggle, with all the incentives to unity which now press upon us, there should be found one single man, claiming this as his native soil, who is willing to lend his power and influence to keep up sectional strife.

I know that the civil war in which we were engaged makes a record of many bloody pages, and examined with a critical eye awakens many unpleasant reminiscences, starts many a ghost from its lonely haunt; but I submit that it is neither wise now profitable to be courting these dead scenes of the past and disentombing incidents and events giving nothing but anguish and pain.

Would we draw a lesson of wisdom from the laws that govern the physical world, we would see that wherever an injury is inflicted upon any of the works of nature which is not irreparable, as soon as the cause of injury is removed, like a good matron and skillful architect she begins the process of restoring things to their original beauty and healthfulness. The woodman thoughtlessly sticks his ax into the beautiful forest-tree, it weeps for a time, but soon the work of renovation begins; or, if the stroke be fatal, from its root will spring the young tree to take its place. Disturb the limpid stream by stirring up the sediment at its bottom, or by any extraneous substance, and how soon does it purge itself of these foreign elements and assume anew its sparkling beauty. The plowman rudely plunges his share into the surface of earth and destroys the beautiful sward which covers its even surface, but he has scarcely passed along, before, by the laws of gravitation, and the action of the winds and rains, the work of leveling and redecorating is begun. So would it be in the social, moral, and intellectual world were it not for the perversity of human nature, and the determination of some men to rough-hew every side of life, in defiance of that divinity which it is said will ultimately "shape all our ends."

Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is now and ever has been in the world a class of men who, like the redoubtable knight of La Mancha, frequent the highways of life with couched lance, offering battle to every comer. I rejoice to know the day has passed for these mock heroics, and they have fallen into contempt with sensible men everywhere.

True statesmanship rises to a plane far above a mere talent for dramatic representations of nursery tales to frighten children or skillful waving of some bloody shirt borrowed from the museum of Fox's Book of Martyrs. What is now looked for and demanded of members of Congress, in this and the other House, is not inflammatory appeals to the worst passions of our nature, not crimination and recrimination, not the arraying of section against section and race against race, but broad, national, practical views of the great questions now pressing upon us for consideration and solution.

In conclusion I wish to assure gentlemen upon this floor, and to proclaim to the outside world, that we of the South have come here in the interest of peace, in the interest of every measure tending to make us a prosperous, happy, united people—in the interest of every citizen of our broad land, white and colored, determined to know no difference on account of section, color, class, or previous condition.

If our friends from other sections of the country will meet us upon this platform we shall soon see that country waking up, like a strong man from sleep, grappling with the mighty problems now pressing for solution, and taking the lead among the nations of the earth in all that is great and good in human affairs. As an important step in this direction let us retrench our expenses, that there may be no charges of extravagance by one party against the other and cause for family quarrels. This bill has been well considered by the committee, and should commend itself to every Representative upon this floor.

Mr. MONROE. In what I have to say upon this bill, Mr. Chairman, I shall speak to the questions involved in it. I have no wish to introduce any political topic. I shall ask leave to call the attention of the Committee of the Whole back to the considerations which the bill and the changes proposed in it naturally suggest. The bill contains some noticeable innovations upon the past practice of the Government. Those changes may be grouped in two classes: the first includes a considerable reduction in the number of the diplomatic and consular representatives of the Government abroad and the second contains a general reduction of salaries. Perhaps there are other points, but these are the two main changes from former legislation. If time will permit, I may say a word upon both these points, although my principal interest is in the first, the diminution of the number of our representatives abroad, the withdrawal of the ministers and consuls from so many foreign nationalities and ports.

The object of this bill of course, as the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has so fully explained, is retrenchment. Now, I wish to say that I am most sincerely in sympathy with that object. I expect often to vote this winter with the Committee on Appropriations to secure that end. But, sir, I cannot help thinking, from some knowledge of the foreign service and of the business of the Department of State, that they offer perhaps about as unpromising a field for doing much in the way of retrenchment as that committee could well find. Congress has not been generally much disposed to give extravagant salaries to the representatives of the Government abroad; and it so happens that for a long time past the Department of State has been administered not only with singular uprightness and honesty, but also with great care and great business ability and discretion.

We must not forget—the gentleman from Mississippi I am sure is not disposed to forget—what the true definition of economy is. I understand a true economy in legislation to be this: That we will not spend the money of the people for anything which will not at least be worth as much as or more than the money which it costs; and it certainly would not be economy to cut off any branch of the service which should be found to be worth more than the money expended upon it. With the true definition of economy in view, I hope often to be able to vote with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, in noticing in the first instance the large reduction in the diplomatic and consular force of the country abroad, I beg leave to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations and of the House, especially the lawyers of the House, (as I am not a lawyer,) to one aspect of this whole question which seems to me to be of some importance. I wish to ask the committee whether this rather abrupt and quite large diminution in our representation abroad is showing quite proper consideration for the other branches of the Government, to whom the duty of making appointments abroad is especially assigned by the Constitution. I do not say that this large reduction, without the advice or consent of the President or the approval of other departments of the Government, is a violation of the prerogative of the President in respect to the appointing power. I suppose lawyers would say that it is not an unconstitutional act to remove entirely these ministers and consuls. But, sir, when we remember that the Constitution makes the President of the United States and the Senate the judges of what diplomatic and consular representatives are required abroad; when we remember that the Constitution vests in the President the appointing power; when we recollect that the President has for a long time sent abroad, according to his best judgment, these ministers and consuls whom you propose so abruptly to withdraw; and that this very year the Executive Department has sent in estimates to pay the salaries and expenses of these very officers who, as you propose, shall no longer have official existence; when we remember all this, while I do not say that the bill violates the Constitution, I do beg leave to submit to the lawyers and statesmen of the House the question whether it exhibits that delicate consideration for the other branches of the Government which it is so important to maintain under a free constitution like ours.

Undoubtedly the Constitution gives this House great power as to salaries; and I freely admit that a couple of thousand dollars more or less in the salary of a minister is in no sense an infringement of the President's prerogative; but I wish to ask the committee whether it is exhibiting the proper consideration for the other branches of the Government for us utterly to withdraw a large number of salaries of officers whom they have been in the habit of appointing and confirming, and whom it has become a settled custom of the Government to send abroad. Have we even given them notice? Is it not rather an abrupt proceeding? We have their estimates here; we have virtually the recommendation of other branches of the Government that these gentlemen shall be paid and sent abroad, but we thus abruptly decide that we will have nothing of this kind done.

I happened, Mr. Chairman, to reread with great interest within a week past the debate upon the Panama mission. It is a most remarkable debate, and no one can go back and read it without profit. There was great diversity of opinion expressed in Congress as to the wisdom of holding the Panama convention; but when Congress came to vote upon the question of providing a certain amount of money for salary and outfit for representatives to that convention, it was voted with cheerfulness. I find that members of Congress at that time gave as a reason for voting for it that, whatever might be thought of the wisdom of the mission, they did not wish to infringe upon the constitutional power of the President; that, as he had recommended the sending of representatives to the Panama convention, the money ought to be appropriated to pay their salaries and expenses. I cannot help thinking, from the character of members of that Congress who discussed the subject, that this view of the case is entitled to great weight.

Why, Mr. Chairman, we are jealous in this House of our constitutional sphere. Let any gentleman get up here and attempt to quote a pr.vate conversation with the President to influence legislation, and we should all shout "Order!" from every part of the House; we should say You have no right to use an opinion of the President, expressed in this way, to influence legislation; this is outside of his constitutional jurisdiction. We would not allow a man to get up here and quote the opinion of a judge of the Supreme Court to influence us; and we are right. This House has always been sensitive and jealous in regard to any encroachment upon its constitutional powers. I approve of that spirit. Let us exhibit the same sensitiveness and the same delicacy in regard to our encroachment upon any other department of the Government.

It is a common maxim you will find in almost any book on government—I believe it was attributed, in the first instance, to Alexander Hamilton, perhaps only because we are in the habit of electing some man to attribute all the wisdom to—that no free government with a free constitution, in which there is a partition of powers between the different Departments, can go on prosperously for a great while without each of the Departments exhibiting a good deal of careful consideration whenever it is in danger of encroaching upon the constitutional prerogative of any other. It is not quite enough that we should not plainly violate the Constitution, but we should keep a little inside of the exact boundary line between our own constitutional authority and that of the President and the Senate. It is not wise that those who are officers of the Government in each Department stand with drawn sword, in an aggressive manner, upon the outer boundary of their constitutional sphere and there threaten others. That is not the way to keep the peace between the different Departments of the Government; that is not the way to preserve the Government in its integrity. The thing which each of the Departments of Government should be careful to do is, first of all, not to encroach in any unconstitutional way upon the prerogative of the other and, secondly, to be careful to exhibit a certain delicacy and consideration in regard to the matter.

In looking back I notice it was the habit of Congress in the earlier part of our history to vote a sum in the aggregate for consular and diplomatic expenses. It was so in Washington's time; it was so still later, and the reason given in Congress for it was that it is not for the House of Representatives to determine to what places the President shall send ministers and consuls; that he is made by the Constitution the proper judge of what points it would be wise for us to send such representatives to. Hence they preferred to vote a round sum, commit it to the care of the President, and then leave him, with the advice and assistance of the Senate, to exercise a sound dis retion in applying it in such manner as he should think the interest and honor of the country demanded. I cannot help thinking it was a better method than dictating to the President what the salary shall be, no matter how remote or obscure the place, and no matter what information the President may have in regard to the importance of the mission or the relations of the Government to the different nations. We have taken this whole matter into our own hands, but I cannot help hinking we have been goi ng a little too far.

Now, Mr. Chairman, leaving this point, I wish to discuss a little the changes which have been made in this bill upon their merits. There are quite a number of these changes. I see that a minister has been withdrawn from Greece. Well, this is not in the present state of our commerce a matter in itself of very great consequence, yet I cannot forget that in the year 1824, I believe, fifty-two years ago last month, a man somewhat known in the United States in his time and still remembered by some people, Daniel Webster, of Massachusetts, rose in his place in the House of Representatives, and before Greece had given a promise even to the world of her ability—yes, she had given promise in the blow she had struck—but before Greece had given any proper evidence of her ability to maintain her independence Daniel Webster offered a resolution to the effect that the President of the United States should be requested to send a diplomatic representative to Greece to express our sympathy to her, inquire after her welfare, and what could be done for her, and to appropriate from the Treasury of the United States such sum of money as should be necessary for this purpose. That was when the United States had an income of $20,000,000, about one-fifteenth part of what it is to-day. And another name which has been heard in this country, Henry Clay, of Kentucky, followed Mr. Webster and made one of the grandest speeches of his life in support of that resolution. Why, sir, hardly anybody at that time, outside of a certain circle of liberty-loving men, believed Greece could maintain her freedom. It was only subsequent events, and very honorable events they were to the powers which took part in them, which demonstrated this fact. And yet these great statesmen were in favor of incurring the expense of sending to her a diplomatic representative. I am aware our commerce in Greece is now small, and yet, Mr. Chairman, I have an impression that even now there might happen any day in Athens or other ports of Greece peril enough to life and property of American citizens to quite justify a salary of seven, eight, or ten thousand dollars a year for a minister to remain in the country.

But a word further; I am not in favor of arranging our service abroad with reference to the present state of our trade and of commerce.

I look for a revival of commerce. It ought to come. It must come. And I believe, with the resources and energy of the American people, with their immense coas-tline and their immense facilities, they will certainly have a great commerce. And I am not in favor of adapting our representation abroad to the state of things which now exists, as if it were the only one which could exist. I would have a minister in Greece if I were permitted to decide the matter, and I would keep in view the fact that the time might come when we would have a considerable commerce with Greece, and when instead of importing the large amount of her products which we now consume from the ports of Liverpool and Havre, we would import them directly in American bottoms from the ports of Greece herself.

This bill takes away the minister from Hayti. I do not quite understand why the minister is removed from Hayti, while one is left for Liberia. Hayti is much nearer to us; its resources are much greater; our commerce with it is much larger. We have really very little to do with Liberia. The United States has about 40 per cent.

of the commerce of Hayti, and as that commerce is pretty large, our interests will become even more important as business revives. Why should a minister be left to Liberia and one be withdrawn from Hayti?

But I must notice another topic in connection with this bill which to me is of more interest than any I have thus far named. I wish to speak of the large reduction in the number of our diplomatic and consular officers in the republics of South America. An important change is made in this respect by the bill. We have now eight representatives to nine republics. This bill proposes to give us four representatives to nine republics. In two instances it calls upon a single minister to take charge of three nations of considerable magnitude and look after all our interests in them. In another instance it makes it the duty of the minister to take charge of two republics; and in another instance, by some matter of grace, one of the South American republics is allowed a whole minister to itself. This is the division of the force there. Well, Mr. Chairman, neither my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations nor any gentleman in the House will for a moment deny that this bill contemplates on the face of it a very large diminution in the intimacy of our relations with those republics. If you are prepared to take the ground that the whole civilized world has been in error in supposing consular and diplomatic representatives had important functions to perform, that the whole thing has been a cheat, that these men are a mere ornament, that the greatest commercial power at the present time on the face of the earth is wholly wrong in having filled the world with her diplomatic and consular representatives, believing them to be supports of her great commercial interests and her immense trade—if that nation is mistaken, if all the nations are mistaken, all the civilized nations that have thought diplomatic and consular representatives useful in the protection of commerce, in acquiring knowledge, in producing more intimate relations, in extending commercial and political influence over the world—if the nations have all been wrong in this, why then not only is this bill right, but we might as well abolish our whole diplomatic and consular force.

But if the whole world have not been mistaken, then we are prepared to believe that, when gentlemen propose to take from the republics of South America one-half of all the diplomatic representation that is now sent to them, this implies the sundering of the bonds that have united us to them to a very large degree; that it implies a diminution of our intimacy with them; that it implies a diminution of the amount of our knowledge of those countries, of their resources and of the fields for our commerce which are open there. I know our friends will tell you that one minister can do the work of three nations. Now, I will not dwell long upon this, because my friend from Illinois, [General HURLBUT,] if I may be allowed to use his name in debate, has been minister of the United States at Bogota, the capital of one of these countries, and may like to give the committee some account of the difficulties a minister of the United States has to encounter in reaching even one capital in safety and in getting home again.

But gentlemen propose that one minister shall take charge of Ecuador, Peru, and Colombia. Bogota is hundreds of miles in the interior. Quito is a long way in the interior. It is a great journey from the coast to Bogota, an immense journey from Bogota to Quito, and a great journey from Lima to either. I state what I believe to be much below the truth when I say that a minister who should be accredited to those three states, and try to divide himself faithfully among them, would have to devote at least one-quarter of all his time to travel.

He would be on the back of a mule about one-fourth of each year. He could hardly be called a minister resident while in that situation, but he would be on the way to some point where he might have duties to perform. He could not give to the republic of each of those states more than one-fourth of the time of each year; he could not be more than three months at any one capital, and my real opinion is that he could not be more than two months in the year at any one place.

Well now, sir, what chance would a minister who remained only two months in a year have in comparison with ministers from Europe who should remain all the time? What opportunity would a minister from the United States have to gain influence and to strengthen the influence of his country?

So that, Mr. Chairman, the practical question which is involved in this bill so far as it relates to the South American republics is simply this: is it a wise thing for us to reduce to so large an extent our intimacy with these republics? Is it a wise, is it a good thing for the United States to make this intimacy with these people not only so much less than it has been, but so much less than that of the great powers of Europe? Is it advisable to allow foreign powers to be so much more intimate with these republics than we propose to be ourselves?

This must depend somewhat upon what these countries are and what their resources are. I hear men talk of the South American republics as if they did not amount to much; but we shall find on examination that they have resources for the foundation of future greatness and power absolutely limitless so far as we can discover.

I have taken the liberty to prepare a table embodying some facts in regard to the wealth and resources of these eleven South American republics. I do not intend to read the details, and will give only the aggregates, but I shall submit the table to the reporters to be printed with my remarks.

The republics of South America.

(a.) From Great Britain only. (b.) To Great Britain only. (c.) Not ascertained. (d.) Excluding sums said to be guaranteed by recent treaties.

I will set before the committee some of the principal facts bearing upon the resources of this great region, and you shall decide whether it is worth while for the United States to keep up an acquaintance with these people.

In the first place, the area of these republics is 2,773,000 miles. That is three-fourths of our total area, including Alaska, and it is well-nigh as large as our area excluding Alaska. It is almost as large as all Europe.

Mr. Chairman, a good deal of study of these countries and their resources has convinced me that as regards the wealth of the ocean, the wealth of the fields, the wealth of the forest, and especially the wealth of the mine, there are not three millions of square miles anywhere on the whole surface of the earth that are superior to this great body of lands.

The population of these republics is sixteen and a half millions—more than one-third of our own population. The imports of these countries for the year 1873, as near as I can arrive at them, were $160,000,000. Now, I want the committee just to hear these words: The aggregate imports of these republics in 1873 were $160,000,000. That is quite an item. We have got so accustomed to deal with tremendous figures here that perhaps gentlemen may not think much of this, but it is really quite an item. The total exports of these republics during the same year amounted to about one hundred and thirty-five millions of dollars. Now, sir, there is enough carrying trade in this immense commerce of one hundred and sixty million of dollars of imports and one hundred and thirty-five millions of exports to contribute largely to the wealth of our country if we only had control of it. But what is the fact? We do not get it at all. Who has got it? Why, Great Britain has got it. Well, sir, has Great Britain got it by calling home her ministers and consuls and refusing liberal provision for representation in all these lands and for acquiring the most thorough knowledge in regard to the trade and resources of these republics? Far from it. Great Britain makes the most liberal provision for diplomatic and consular representation in all these countries of any nation on the face of the earth; and she reaps the advantage of it. Great Britain reaps the advantage of all this trade. It is really as much her trade, so far as profit is concerned, as if it were carried on within the limits of the British Isles.

What does Great Britain do? She sends her vessels out to all these countries and they return loaded down with the products of those States in the form of raw material. If you go to Montevideo and Buenos Ayres you will find British vessels loading with hides, skins, and tallow and yerba mate. At Valparaiso and other ports they are loading with copper and other ores. They carry guano from Peru, as well as calisaya bark, niter, sheep, wool, and alpaca wool. From Ecuador, Colombia, and Venezuela they carry cotton, coffee, cocoa, and a great variety of dyes and drugs, and valuable woods. I will not detain the committee by enumerating all the articles these countries produce. I have given but a short list of those productions, of the articles of raw material which are carried to Great Britain by her ships.

And what does she do in return? Her ships carry back to those countries her manufactures of cotton, wool, linen, her manufactures of iron, her machinery, and all sorts of cutlery and implements, everything that the miner, the planter, the house-keeper may want; a vast multitude of that class of goods which in this country we include under the head of "Yankee notions."

Now, although Great Britain carries away the larger part, say two-thirds or three-fourths, of the $135,000,000 of exports from these countries, yet she takes care to carry back manufactured articles enough to keep a good healthy balance of trade in her favor.

The receipts of these countries into their respective treasuries amounted in the aggregate in 1873 to $110,000,000—more than a third of our own revenue; and their aggregate expenditures amounted to $117,000,000. That does not show a very large aggregate deficit in those countries. And I must also inform you that these countries all aspire to the possession of a national debt. They desire to take their places among the great nations of the earth in this respect. Those debts amount to $428,000,000; only about one-fifth of the amount of our debt. They are not so nearly up with us in the matter of national debts as they are in other matters; but when you come to think of it they have a good, respectable national debt. I obtain these facts mainly from the Statesman's Year Book for 1875, the latest copy in my possession. All this money is borrowed in England.

These countries are building railroads and carrying on all sorts of internal improvements for the purpose of developing trade and resources. Great Britain sees it is a good thing for her and for them to develop and bring out their resources, and British subjects lend their money for that purpose. Perhaps you will say that British subjects will have a hard time in recovering their money. Do not give yourselves any concern about this. Great Britain, through the closeness of the intimacy which she has cultivated with these countries, has a first mortgage on the whole of them—on the choicest and the best of all they have—in order to secure the payment of the interest and principal of the money loaned to them.

Great Britain has a mortgage on the customs revenues of Ecuador and Colombia, on the guano islands of Peru, and on the mines of the other States, and the profits of their railroads. While lending them her money, she has taken good care to secure in various ways the payment of the interest and principal. At the present time Great Britain, commercially speaking, has really taken possession of these eleven republics, and is making their mighty resources and the great profits of those resources a tributary to the tremendous tide of her prosperity and power.

I do not say this in the way of criticism; I mean merely to compliment Great Britain as a first-class business country; that is all. There has been no dishonesty and there is no dishonor on her part in the transaction. In fact, the relations of Great Britain with these countries has been greatly to their advantage. I only have the natural feeling of an American when I think how much more properly all this most profitable trade might come to us, and how in various ways we have failed to take the proper steps to secure it.

What are the facts that lie on the face of these statistics to which I have referred? Here they are: First, here is an immense region, a continent, one of the noblest on the face of the whole earth, with resources of wealth absolutely without limit; secondly, this immense business, these vast profits, which ought to have come to the United States, have fallen into the hands of England. These are facts for us to consider. But there is another and practical question for us, and that is whether there is any reason in the nature of things why this should be so, why it has been so, or why it should continue to be so.

My friend before me [Mr. O'BRIEN] is a Baltimorean, and he knows the interest of that port in the South American states. I have friends here from the port of New York who feel a similar interest. Now the practical question for them and myself and all of us here in this House is whether there is any necessity for this state of things. I say, Mr. Chairman, there is no good reason whatever. On the other hand we have such important advantages in our relations to these republics that if we would only take the proper steps we should certainly control almost the whole of this trade.

What are these advantages? Why, sir, in the first place the political sympathy of these states is with us much more strongly than it is with Great Britain. Their constitutions were almost all modeled after ours. The people there name their children George Washington and Benjamin Franklin and Thomas Jefferson. I never met a man from Chili or Peru who did not grasp my hand eagerly and speak of my being an American as a thing which made me his first cousin, because I was a citizen of the great Republic. They naturally like us; they naturally sympathize with us; they would prefer to have intimate commercial, diplomatic, and social relations with us to any other people on the face of the earth.

Then we have a great advantage as regards proximity. From our Atlantic cities we can easily reach Venezuela and the river Platte. We can reach the Pacific republics across the Isthmus or from our Pacific cities very readily. We ought, then, on every account to have had this immense and very valuable trade.

But, sir, the war, the desolating war, the war that absorbed all our money and all our strength, undoubtedly the war broke down our commerce. Cruisers were sweeping the seas. Our commerce, from being one of the greatest in the whole world, shrank at once to something comparatively insignificant. We lost our commerce. We could not help that while the war lasted. But, thank God, the war is past. Peace has returned. We are now at liberty to go to work and use our united energies to re-establish commercial relations, to make business revive, to pass such legislation as shall be most favorable for putting us in advantageous relations with these southern republics, so as to bring back to us what we have lost. That is what we should do.

My honest opinion is that we have only to cultivate intimate relations with these people, to acquire a thorough knowledge of all their resources, and to wait a little until the tide of business in our country shall rise, as I believe it must before long, and then we shall find ourselves recovering that lost field of commercial profit. It belongs to us, and we ought to have it.

Let me say further that the commerce of these South American states has the great advantage of being a fresh field. It is comparatively a virgin field; and it belongs to us. Why, sir, the avenues and opportunities for trade in the Old World are very much preoccupied; but it is not so with South America. Those states have not yet taken that fixed and rigid character which belongs to the countries of the East. There is nothing to prevent our going there and asserting our claim. I believe that one of the noblest fields for commerce which the future will develop will be these states of South America; and as Americans we ought to possess it.

Our friends who have charge of this bill will no doubt tell us that the existing commerce with those States is what they base the bill upon; that our very small commerce there at the present time is a good reason for cutting off our close relations with them. But, Mr. Chairman, do we mean to accept the present low and poor condition of commercial prosperity in this country as a thing unchangeable? Do we mean to adapt our consular and diplomatic representation abroad, and all our legislation here to the present amount of our commerce, as if that must be, by some sad providence of God, an everlasting permanency; as if we are never to have anything better? I am not in favor of that. Do we mean to proclaim to the whole civilized world that we do not intend to be a great commercial power; that we mean to have our names erased from the list of the commercial nations? Is that the feeling of this House? I cannot believe it is. I have hope enough in the future commercial prosperity of my country to be willing now and then to risk the salary of a minister at $7,500 a year or a consul at $1,500 or $2,000 a year on the chance of getting it. I have hope enough of the future of the country to be willing to make a little provision for it. No, sir; we must not shape all our legislation as if we had no future.

If there were time, and if it were worth while, I might inquire whether it is in accordance with the traditions of our country and with the political views which have been most favored among us, to give to foreign powers so much more influence with these republics than we are asserting for ourselves?

I have no wish to introduce any political discussion here; I will simply say as an American that I do not like to see Great Britain, France, Germany, or any other country—and I admire them all and wish none of them ill—I do not like to see any of them get ahead of us in any of the capitals of South America. We are naturally first in these capitals and should stand first there and have the greatest influence.

But, Mr. Chairman, I hurry on to notice another point, which our friends perhaps have overlooked, and that is, that there is a great inclination on the part of American citizens to invest their money and engage in business in the South American states. I discovered that years ago when residing in Brazil. I think there is no foreign country where an American loves to go and risk some part of his money better than in one of these states. It is so to a considerable extent already; it would be so to a greater extent if our business was prosperous; and the reason of it I take to be that there is an immense amount of pioneer work to do in all these South American states. They have to build railroads and to do an immense number of things which we began a great many years ago. They have not the capital to do it; they have not the engineers; they have not the enterprise; they have not cultivated, though they are intelligent people, the sort of capacity that takes in charge large enterprises, organizes them well, and carries them on successfully. And there is no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that Americans are the best adapted of any people on the face of the whole earth to do this work for them. And hence, although business has been so dull and our country has been so depressed, it has been hard work to keep Yankees out of these South American states and from engaging in business enterprises there. They would perhaps have a little capital of their own, and they would find residents of those countries who had some themselves. The capital would be put together and new enterprises commenced. Americans in those countries have established ferry lines; they have built street railroads; they have constructed roads from the coast to the interior; and they have furnished locomotives for roads which have been built by these states. Why, I happen to know that the great locomotive establishment in Philadelphia, of Baldwin & Co., has furnished the locomotives for the principal railroad in Brazil, the Dom Pedro Segundo Railroad; and, though an honest English gentleman did assure me with the utmost sobriety that he was satisfied the death-rate of the city of Rio had been greatly increased by the screaming of these Yankee locomotives, yet I never learned that the directors of the road became so alarmed that they discontinued importing them.

and I believe American locomotives in great number are screaming up and down the grades of that railroad to-day.

Americans go out there and form mining companies and engage as engineers. I notice that Mr. Henry Meiggs, who perhaps may be known to some of you, has had the whole charge of constructing the seven government railways in the republic of Peru. It has been all done by one American. My friend from New York [Mr. HEWITT] says all his engineers are also Americans. These are some of the facts which exist even in the present low condition of business enterprise in this country And I ask you whether there is not ground for the belief, if business revive and this country shall be as prosperous as it once was, that our citizens will naturally take possession of all this great pioneer work and all these internal improvements?

Well, sir, what is the bearing of this upon our diplomatic representation there? Our American citizens take contracts. They get charters from these governments. In some of these states revolutions come. I suppose you have heard of revolutions in South America. Bolivia especially has been liable to them; most other states, I am glad to say, are more quiet and orderly. When revolutions come no one knows who is responsible for anything. The American loses his charter, his contract is broken, and valuable interests are put in peril. And what does he want then? He wants a minister; he wants a cultivated American gentleman, with strong will, with tact, good presence, and good feeling, who will be a personal representative of the United States of America upon the spot. And I tell my friends who have introduced this bill, there have been cases—I have a list made out in writing, but I will not detain the House by reading it, because I see my hour is passing away—I tell my friends there have been cases in which a minister abroad, of good sense and good credit in the capital where he resides, has saved enough in a single morning's walk to pay his salary ten times over. Now, is it good economy, when American interests are naturally flowing in as the atmosphere flows into a vacuum, to say that Americans shall not have a diplomatic representation in most of these states, or only the one-fourth of one, to look after these important interests?

I am reminded just at this point of an anecdote told me by a gentleman who now occupies a distinguished judicial position in this District, who was once minister resident at Bolivia, which is the most revolutionary of all these countries. I think that what he said to me was that there were three revolutions in Bolivia while he was there, and that each of these revolutions overran the whole of the country except his office, in the door of which he stood with a revolver and stopped the revolution when it came. Now, American interests demand that there shall be some spot in every one of these countries that a revolution cannot conveniently overrun, some island in the watery waste, some fortified spot which shall be the impregnable citadel of American rights, and of American life, liberty, and property, at moments of such peril. It seems to me we are utterly mistaken when we think it is a real saving to the American people to deny a minister to countries like these, where interests so important are constantly accumulating in the hands of our citizens.

Let me advert to one more point in this connection, and that is that the United States is naturally the umpire and the friend of all these republics in their troubles, their troubles with each other and their troubles with the powers of Europe. They have troubles about boundaries, they have questions with England, and France, and Germany, and Spain, and perhaps other countries, and they naturally turn to the United States to act as umpire, or as negotiator, or as friend in such circumstances. Now we ought to do this work for them. We ought to be prepared to do it. We ought to have a minister at hand who can commence it, and can aid in it in every one of these capitals; for this is not only a neighborly work for us to do for them, but it is a most useful work for us, because it establishes us in their good opinion, it plants us firmly in the country. No better thing can happen to the United States than to have all this kind of work to do. At this very moment one of these republics of South America has asked our Government to arbitrate and help to get it out of trouble—some trouble it has with one of the powers of Europe.

Now, Mr. Chairman, these have been my views in regard to the importance of maintaining intimate diplomatic and consular relations with these countries. But it was very gratifying to me in rereading some interesting portions of the history of the country to see how this view of the importance of the relations to South America has been advocated by well-known statesmen of an earlier time. My hour has perhaps nearly expired, but the committee I am sure would not feel wearied at hearing a few words from Henry Clay in regard to the importance of intimate relations between the United States and these republics. I happen to hold in my hand one of the volumes of the History of Congress giving an account of its debates, and under the head of "South American Independence" I find that the following resolution, which had been introduced into the House of Representatives by Mr. Clay in the year 1820, was discussed and passed by the House. As I am somewhat tired, I will ask the Clerk to be good enough to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law a suitable outfit and salary for such minister or ministers as the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may send to any of the governments of South America which have established and are maintaining their independence of Spain.

Mr. MONROE. The Clerk will now read a few sentences from Mr. Clay's speech in support of that resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Here Mr. Clay quoted a few passages from the work of the Abbe de Pradt, recently translated by one of our citizens, which, he said, though the author was not very popular among crowned heads, no man could read without being enlightened and instructed. These passages dwelt on the importance of the commerce of South America when freed from its present restraints, &c. What would I give, exclaimed Mr. Clay, could we appreciate the advantages which may be realized by our pursuing the course which I propose! It is in our power to create a system of which we shall be the center, and in which all South America will act with us. In respect to commerce we should be most benefited; this country would become the place of deposit of the commerce of the world. Our citizens engaged in foreign trade were at present disheartened by the condition of that trade; they must seek new channels for it, and none so advantageous could be found as those which the trade with South America would afford. Mr. Clay took a prospective view of the growth of wealth and increase of the population of this country and of South America.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. I hope the committee will grant the gentleman from Ohio the favor of an extension of his time for a few minutes longer.

There was no objection, and Mr. MONROE'S time was extended indefinitely.

Mr. RANDALL. I may remark that the general debate on this bill is not limited nor is it designed to limit it.

Mr. MONROE. I have already felt obliged to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for his courtesy, and am very willing to be obliged to him again.

Now I take the liberty to invite Henry Clay to take part in this debate. He has taken part in it on this floor in your hearing. At a time when the prospect for commerce with South America was certainly much less than it is now, when any such figures I suppose in our own commerce had not been heard of, as one hundred and sixty millions of imports and one hundred and thirty-five millions of exports in a single year, at a time when so little was positively known about South America, Mr. Clay introduced that resolution into the House and secured its passage. I ask the attention of my friends to this fact, that Henry Clay in the House of Representatives gave it as a fundamental reason for intimate and liberal diplomatic relations with the South American republics that it would help us to get control of that noble commerce which the future should develop there. That is pretty important authority on this occasion, and I hope our friends will study it.

Now, sir, I do not want to waste money. I like to save money as well as anybody here, but I think it is a poor kind of economy to save the salaries of three or four ministers and half a dozen consuls at the expense of losing the direct and natural hold we have upon this great and prosperous trade.

You may tell me that some of these ministers have not been strong men, and have not been very useful; well, then, let us have stronger and better men there. I verily believe that it would pay the United States well to send men of first-class ability, men who are thinkers, statisticians, and observers, who shall go there and exhaust the knowledge that is to be obtained in regard to these states, and then come back to us laden with the noble freight of their industry. I could name men—but it might be invidious—I could name men whom I think it would do us honor to send to the South American republics to engage in this great work and go to the bottom of the whole subject.

Well, sir, at a later period an act of Congress was passed, May 4, 1822, making an appropriation of $100,000 "for such missions to the independent nations on the American continent as the President might deem proper." This was done when our revenue was only $20,000,000. The sum of $100,000, under the influence of men like Henry Clay, was then voted for this purpose; a sum which I believe is almost equal to all that has been expended on the missions to South America for years, although the number of states in South America has in the meantime so largely increased.

I will add that I feel the same objection to reducing the number of consuls that I have expressed to reducing the number of ministers. I believe that it would be a better plan to increase the number of our consuls and send out abler men, first-rate business men. It would be well to send strong business men to all the principal ports in the world with which we have commercial relations. I believe, sir, that the time is coming when as a nation we shall feel the importance of doing this. The responsibilities of a consul in a large port are very great; he is one of the principal protectors of our Treasury. The invoice of goods which he certifies to is held as prima facie evidence as to the correctness of the return made at New York, and nothing is more important to protect our revenue and to prevent frauds and swell the amount of our receipts than that we should have men of high character and ability at every consular port abroad. Instead of weakening the service I think it is a good time to strengthen it by appointing strong, practical, business men. That would be the best thing for the commerce of the country and for the protection of the Treasury that could be done. I am in favor of arranging our consular and diplomatic system on a scale somewhat fitted to the commerce that is to come, and not only to the commerce which now exists.

Mr. Chairman, when I commenced, I had thought I might say something on the question of the reduction of salaries, but I have spoken on that portion of the subject in which I felt the deepest interest, and to which my attention had been principally called, and therefore I cheerfully defer any discussion of salaries until we shall take up the different clauses of the bill under the five-minute rule.

In closing, I desire to thank the committee most sincerely for their courtesy.

Mr. HOLMAN obtained the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman yield for a motion that the committee rise?

Mr. HOLMAN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOSKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PAY AND ALLOWANCE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BANNING, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1453) to regulate the pay and allowance of Army officers with a substitute, (H. R. No. 1806,) and moved that the substitute and a report accompanying the same be printed, and the bill recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I find by reference to the RECORD that I am recorded as voting in the negative upon the amendment offered by my friend from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to the proposed constitutional amendment which was under consideration yesterday. I voted in the affirmative, and ask that the correction be made in the Journal.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

Mr. STENGER. In the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings I find my name recorded as not voting on the constitutional amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] I was present and voted "no," and ask that the correction be made.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Before that motion is put the Chair will lay before the House certain executive documents now upon his desk.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE UPPER MISSISSIPPI.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Engineers on surveys, &c., on the Upper Mississippi River, and recommending an appropriation of $65,000 to improve the same; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN THE MISSISSIPPI AND THE LAKES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa on the subject of a water highway between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan by way of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REV. JOHN R. HAMILTON.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, a report of the Adjutant-General upon the bill (H. R. No. 64) for the relief of Rev. John R. Hamilton; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PRESIDIO MILITARY RESERVATION, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, a copy of Senate Executive Document No. 55 and Senate Report No. 104, Forty-third Congress, first session, being a report on the Presidio military reservation, San Francisco, California; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN FUNDS TO THE TREASURER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to return herewith without my approval House bill No. 1561, entitled "An act transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds from the Secretary of the Interior to the Treasurer of the United States," for the reasons set forth in the accompanying communication from the Secretary of the Interior.

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 3, 1876.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication from the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 2, 1876.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 29th ultimo, transmitting H. R. bill No. 1561 and requesting this Department to report whether any objections to its becoming a law are known to exist. In reply I have the honor to state that I am fearful the act is not sufficiently definite in terms to accomplish the end desired, namely, the mere transfer of the custody of said trust fund, enabling this Department to receive the interest from the custodian and apply it as heretofore without the intervention of Congress.

The nature of the guardianship and control over the Indians exercised by me as Secretary and trustee is such as to require this Department to keep an account of the funds to their credit or held in trust for them, and to receive this interest on their trust funds promptly when due. I am fearful that this bill may not allow me to do so; and to guard against any danger of embarrassment in the transaction of this business I inclose a draught of a bill which, if substituted for the one already passed, will, it is believed, obviate the difficulties which may arise if the present bill should become a law.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. CHANDLER,
Secretary.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the message and accompanying documents be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I desire to say that the bill which has been returned by the President was reported from the Committee on Appropriations at the suggestion of the Department of the Interior. A subcommittee of that committee, as I understand, waited upon the Secretary of the Interior, who suggested an amendment thereto, which was incorporated in the bill as passed.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and they can examine and report upon it.

Mr. RANDALL. I only meant to place the committee right.

Mr. GARFIELD. If it has been ascertained that there is some inaccuracy of expression in the bill——

Mr. RANDALL. It is a very strange thing that we should pass a bill at the instance of the Department, and that very Department should cause it to be vetoed.

Mr. HOLMAN. A bill prepared at the instance of the Department itself?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. GARFIELD. Let it go to the committee.

Mr. RANDALL. That is my motion.

The motion of Mr. RANDALL was then agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. DAVIS was granted leave of absence for five days, on account of important business.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, was granted leave of absence from the 4th to the 16th instant.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of the Grand Lodge of Good Templars of Indiana, signed by the officers thereof, representing 13,000 members, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BARNUM: The petition of citizens of Wilmington, Delaware, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petition of Lawrence Street Congregational church, Lawrence, Massachusetts, signed by the pastor and officers, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Also, the petition of Anna D. Freeland, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THROCKMORTON: The petition of citizens of Cooke County, Texas, for a post-route from Gainesville to Dexter, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WARD: Remonstrance of Jed Fry & Co., J. H. Winchester & Co., and others, against the passage of bill No. 523, authorizing vessels built abroad, but belonging wholly to citizens of the United States, to be registered as vessels of the United States, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: Three petitions of citizens of Detroit, Michigan, for authority for the construction of a bridge across the river at that place, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York: The petition of citizens of Keeseville, New York, for the repeal of the stamp-tax on safety matches, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin: The petitions of citizens of Waukesha, and of Kenosha, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana: The petition of citizens of Washington, Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIS: The petition of the Madison Avenue Baptist church, of New York City, signed by the pastor and clerk, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of George Crilly, relating to the Des Moines Canal, to the Committee on Public Lands.

Also, papers relating to the petition of Jonathan Roberts, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 4, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1797) providing for the sale of the Kansas Indian lands in Kansas to actual settlers, and for the disposition of the proceeds of the sale, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. SARGENT, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the repeal of the specie resumption act of 1875, and to repeal the same at once; and further, to so legislate that the industrious people of the country may be supplied with a currency issued directly by the Government, without the intervention of any corporations, banking or otherwise. I simply wish to say that I do not sympathize with the prayer of this petition. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM presented the petition of John O. Finch and 269 others, citizens of Brown County, Wisconsin, praying for an appropriation to complete the Fox River improvement, and for the construction of a canal along the banks of the Wisconsin River from Portage City to Prairie Du Chien, Wisconsin; which was referred to the Committe on Commerce.

Mr. WALLACE presented nine petitions, signed by 1,500 workmen in iron of Cambria County, Pennsylvania, praying for aid to the Texas Pacific Railway; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of W. F. Carrington, M. D., formerly of the United States Navy, praying for the removal of his political disabilities; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented two petitions of citizens of Clearfield County, Pennsylvania, praying for aid to the Texas Pacific Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented the petition of citizens of Philadelphia engaged in the iron and coal business, praying Congress to extend the national credit to the completion of a great southern line to the Pacific; which was referred to the Committee on Railroads.

He also presented a petition of soldiers and sailors of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of an act granting to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war and their heirs (except commissioned officers) a bounty of eight and a third dollars per month for the time served, deducting all United States bounty heretofore paid; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented six petitions of laborers in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to aid the construction of the Texas Pacific Railway Company; which were referred to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. WRIGHT presented the petition of Charles E. Hovey, praying compensation for collecting certain derelict claims and dues belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of the Massachusetts State Temperance Alliance, signed by Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., president, and Rev. William M. Thayer, secretary, asking that no appropriation of money be made in aid of the centennial exhibition if the centennial buildings and grounds are to be used for the sale of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of John D. Runkle, William B. Rogers, and Edmund H. Hewins, a committee of the Society of Arts of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, asking for the appointment of a commission to consider the subject of a uniform metric system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ALLISON presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of Iowa, in favor of securing a commercial highway by water between the Mississippi River and Lake Michigan, via the valleys of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS presented the petition of Maria Anna Knauber, widow of Adam Knauber, deceased, formerly a private in Company F, First Kansas Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the petition of Leslie Combs, a captain in the war of 1812, praying for arrears of pension and an increase of same; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Luther Hall, of Boston, praying an extension of his patent for a machine for shaping heels of boots and shoes, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 398) for the relief of Luther Hall.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Abraham Sellers, administrator of Frederick Vincent, who was administrator of James La Caze, late of the firm of La Caze & Mallet, praying payment of a balance due for advances made by that firm during the revolutionary war, to report it back, and recommend that the claim be rejected and the committee discharged from its further consideration. I ask a vote of the Senate concurring in this report.

The report was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 399) to limit the value of household effects entitled to free entry; which was read twice by its title, and, together with a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury relating to that subject, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 400) amendatory of the fifth section of the act of the 18th of May, 1872, making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1872, and for former years, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAMILTON. I introduce that bill by request. I do not know anything about the merits of it. I move that it be referred to the Committeee on the Judiciary and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of James L. Sherman, first lieutenant United States Army, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to two propositions. The first makes it necessary that a brief portion of the proceedings of day before yesterday be read at the Secretary's desk. I ask that the part which I have marked be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. SARGENT. * * * But, says the Senator from Delaware, it was entirely improper (or in effect he says so, because I have not his remarks) for Mr. Shepherd to get lawyers to go in and browbeat the committee and the witnesses for the committee brought there to prove that he was guilty of fraud.

"One touch of nature makes the whole world kin."

Occasionally you can find by a mere gesture the flow of a man's thoughts. It was perfectly right for the Government to hire counsel to go in there and browbeat Mr. Shepherd's witnesses or those of the board of public works, to hunt them down, to insinuate fraud, to use all the arts of lawyers, if they did so. That meets with no condemnation; but when the board of public works were on trial and desired to be heard by counsel, they not being lawyers, it was an unworthy thing for them to employ counsel to meet those brought forward by the Government.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator will allow me to ask whether he says that the Government employed counsel?

Mr. SARGENT. I mean to say that the memorialists employed counsel, and there was no criticism against the memorialists' employing counsel. They were hunting somebody down. Give them blood-hounds by all means. Let them hunt them down! But how dense must be that prejudice which can find objection to those who are being hunted down using the ordinary method which the law allows the meanest culprit in the lowest police court, and certainly in the highest tribunals of the land, to defend himself against what he believes or asserts to be unjust aspersions.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator really believe that I objected to the employment of counsel by Mr. Shepherd, or that anything I said yesterday bore such a construction?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Shepherd even employed counsel to go in there and browbeat the witnesses brought forward against him!

Mr. BAYARD. I express my regrets that it was impossible for me to run over my speech last night owing to an engagement over which I had no control. I have handed it to the reporter to-day, and the words will be found in every respect as they were taken down, and so far from my saying that it was wrong to employ counsel, I said he employed counsel, as he had a perfect right to do; but I objected to those counsel being paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I made the inquiry of the Senator and his friends and other friends of Mr. Shepherd whether the fact was so or not, and that has been construed by him into what he terms a reckless statement. I am not now positive of adjectives in my remarks here. They must speak for themselves and the RECORD will speak for me. If it is reckless to ask a question in regard to a fact which I say here was given to me on creditable authority, then I must be convicted of that offense; but surely it is strange that the Senator should so misunderstand me, as he must have done, to suppose that I made the least objection to the employment of counsel freely by these gentlemen. I think Mr. Shepherd and others came before that committee either on the one side or the other precisely on the same footing, and they must bear their own expenses and not ask the people of this country to bear them for them.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not refer to that part of the Senator's speech to which he now alludes, but my recollection seems to me to be distinct. If I am wrong, no one takes more pleasure than I to make amends for any injustice I may have done to the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. That will be due to the Senator himself.

Mr. SARGENT. It is due to myself and my own self-respect to understand it without being reminded of it. But I say that in another portion of the Senator's speech I understood him distinctly to say among the accusations against Mr. Shepherd that he had employed counsel, or that the board of public works had employed counsel, to browbeat witnesses, and the phrase that he employed counsel for such a purpose implied that he had no business to have counsel there or it was a reflection on the character of the counsel employed. That was the remark which he made and which is distinctly lodged in my memory. If I find, however, that I am mistaken on an unchanged record, (and if the Senator says the record is unchanged it must be so,) I will, if he desires it, call the attention of the Senate to it, and to the error I make. I would stoop to no injustice.

Mr. SARGENT. In some aspects I should consider this matter very important; that is, if I had done any injustice to the Senator by quoting from memory from his remarks insisting that my recollection was distinct. As I find by reference to his remarks I did no injustice, perhaps it becomes to me of less importance. Yesterday morning I called the attention of the honorable Senator to the passage of his speech to which I referred, separated by some pages from the part to which he thought I alluded, but marking the passage, and then gave him the entire day to simply say to the Senate that my memory was not in fault. As he did not seem to think the subject important enough to do so, or for some other reason did not do so, I now desire, simply in justification of my memory at that time, to read the passage to which I referred, the passage in which I said that, among other accusations against Mr. Shepherd or the board of public works, he said that they employed counsel to browbeat witnesses. The passage was as follows:

> Counsel were employed by Mr. Shepherd and his associates to browbeat the witnesses, to conduct fierce, rigid, and recriminating cross-examinations. Prosecutions were threatened, indictments were found, and, sir, not only that, but a resort to crime not fit to be mentioned in our own day and time.

To each of these matters I alluded in my speech. The part, however, to which exception was taken was that the Senator said that counsel were employed by Mr. Shepherd to browbeat witnesses.

This I make in simple justification to myself in order to show that I was not doing the Senator injustice, or at any rate did not intend to do so. Of course I do not hold him responsible for the inferences I drew from his language. Those were my own, and they have been read again at the Clerk's desk.

There is another matter to which I wish to allude very briefly. Yesterday the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] rose in his place and actuated unquestionably by the honorable motive which would induce any Senator to rise if he thought something was wrong which would affect the matter under consideration, and stated to the Senate, as I understood him, and I am refreshed in my recollection of that, that the board of funding and commissioners of this District had on a certain day, which he stated to be the 27th, passed a resolution that in consideration of certain action pending before Congress affecting their duties they would issue no more bonds; that subsequently thereafter they had violated this resolution of their own and issued bonds, a circumstance which he deemed suspicious. On inquiring of the Senator from Connecticut whether he charged fraud on that account he said yes, he did charge fraud. Now I desire that the following letter of Mr. Kelly, the treasurer of that board, and the resolution to which the Senator referred, may be read, merely remarking that any defense of mine of these gentlemen, either attempted yesterday or so far as it may be implied in my remarks to-day, would not be expected of me as a republican. I say that to show my own impartiality and fairness in the discussion of this matter, because the president of the board, Mr. W. W. Corcoran, as is well known, is a democrat, and of the other members of the board (there are three or four of them) Mr. Sweeny was the late democratic mayor of Georgetown, and another member of the board, Mr. Davis, is a well-known democrat, never has been a republican, and the treasurer of the board is Mr. Kelly, the only republican on the board. I ask that the resolution be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONERS OF THE SINKING FUND,
Washington, D. C., February 4, 1876.

Hon. A. A. SARGENT,
United States Senate:

In reply to your inquiry as to whether any 3.65 bonds have been issued by this commission since the 27th ultimo, and, if so, how many, I have the honor to say that such bonds have been issued to the extent of $149,750 since that date, being a part of those provided for in a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of our board held on the 25th ultimo, a copy of which is inclosed. None have been issued except as authorized by that resolution.

With much respect, your obedient servant,

MOSES KELLY,
Treasurer.

Whereas a proposition is now pending in Congress for the transfer to the Department of the Treasury of the United States of the duties heretofore performed by this board; and whereas a bill has been introduced and is now pending to prevent the further issue of 3.65 per cent. District of Columbia bonds:

Be it therefore resolved, That no further issue of said 3.65 per cent. District of Columbia bonds be made by this board until the Congress of the United States shall have acted upon the amount of bonds to be issued, excepting so far as necessary to complete the delivery of those for which applications have thus far been filed—$363,400.

Mr. SARGENT. So that the action of the board since that time has been entirely in consonance with the resolution which was unanimously adopted by them, up to this time none being issued except about one-half the amount which they at that time reserved to themselves the power to issue, being certificates pending before them at that time and which they had been requested under the law to convert into 3.65 bonds.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, so far from having the least objection, I am very well content that the honorable Senator should have referred again to the record of this debate in order to settle the question of his accuracy or inaccuracy in quoting my remarks upon the subject of the employment of counsel by members of the board of public works at the time an investigation into the affairs of this District was going on before a joint committee of the two Houses. The language of the Senator was first that of decided reproach that the speech which I made to the Senate on the day previous had not appeared in the RECORD. I felt exceedingly sorry that such was the case. It is not my custom to withhold my remarks at all, and much less where they are in the course of a running debate in which a reply should have been made. I explained to him that my speech had contained a great many figures, and desiring to be accurate I proposed to compare the data which I had used before I finally committed them to the RECORD. Private engagements prevented me from seeing the reporter's manuscript until the morning of the Senator's speech. The manuscript then was lying upon my table and I was going over it, comparing the figures I had used with the books from which I had taken them at the time he rose and found fault with great asperity of manner on the fact of my speech not being in the RECORD, and he seemed to think that it was withheld to avoid having proper answer made to it. It was an imputation that was unpleasant; it was one that I felt to be very unjust, and no one who has any knowledge of my character would suppose for an instant there was any such intention on my part. Therefore it was that having my eye upon the part of the speech to which the Senator referred, that is to say, the question which I put to him and the other friends and champions of the late board of public works, whether the counsel employed by the board of public works had been paid out of the public Treasury or not, I read then, and shall not now repeat, the precise language as it came unaltered in form or substance from the hands of the Official Reporter. It is not necessary for me to read it again. But after that the Senator said—I read from page 22 of the RECORD of yesterday:

> I mean to say that the memorialists employed counsel, and there was no criticism against the memorialists' employing counsel. They were hunting somebody down. Give them bloodhounds by all means. Let them hunt them down! But how dense must be that prejudice which can find objection to those who are being hunted down using the ordinary method which the law allows the meanest culprit in the lowest police court, and certainly in the highest tribunals of the land, to defend himself against what he believes or asserts to be unjust aspersions.

The "dense ignorance" of which the Senator complained was supposed to be that of myself.

Mr. SARGENT. I did not speak of ignorance.

Mr. BAYARD. "Dense prejudice;" I beg pardon. "Prejudice" is the word.

> Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator really believe that I objected to the employment of counsel by Mr. Shepherd, or that anything I said yesterday bore such a construction?
>
> Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir; I understood the Senator to say that Mr. Shepherd even employed counsel to go in there and browbeat the witnesses brought forward against him!
> Mr. BAYARD. I express my regrets that it was impossible for me to run over my speech last night owing to an engagement over which I had no control. I have handed it to the reporter to-day, and the words will be found in every respect as they were taken down, and so far from my saying that it was wrong to employ counsel, I said he employed counsel, as he had a perfect right to do; but I objected to those counsel being paid out of the Treasury of the United States. I made the inquiry of the Senator and his friends and other friends of Mr. Shepherd whether the fact was so or not, and that has been construed by him into what he terms a reckless statement. I am not now positive of adjectives in my remarks here. They must speak for themselves and the RECORD will speak for me. If it is reckless to ask a question in regard to a fact which I say here was given to me on creditable authority, then I must be convicted of that offense; but surely it is strange that the Senator should so misunderstand me, as he must have done, to suppose that I made the least objection to the employment of counsel freely by these gentlemen. I think Mr. Shepherd and others came before that committee either on the one side or the other precisely on the same footing, and they must bear their own expenses and not ask the people of this country to bear them for them.

Now, sir, turning to the very RECORD of that day which contained my remarks on which the Senator was commenting, I will read again in the Senator's hearing what I said. I read from page 5 of the same RECORD:

I do not know the fact, but I have been credibly informed that, while the taxpayers of this District were with their private moneys fighting Shepherd and his confederates before the joint committee and Shepherd was defending himself, as he had a perfect right to do, by counsel, the private counsel of these discarded officials were paid in the same 3.65 bonds very large fees for defending that which was admitted to be so wrong that it was legislated out of existence. Is that so or is it not so? I am told those counsel have been paid, paid by the people of the United States, paid by the people of this District, for defending a wrong so flagitious that the very capacity to perform it has been swept from the statute-book by an almost unanimous vote of Congress.

Mr. President, what was said before has now been reiterated; nor do I propose to run a commentary upon it. It is there. The Senate will see, and I think the honorable Senator will see, that, while I did in one part of my speech and a prior part comment upon the manner in which Mr. Shepherd's private counsel were permitted to cross-examine and, I repeat, to brow-beat witnesses before that committee—and I could readily turn to the names of the witnesses and the pages of the testimony where men were asked the most insulting questions until the committee were compelled to stop his counsel and prevent their system and manner of examination—I freely recognized his right to be represented by counsel. What occurred before the committee was all published in the prints of the day; it is published now in our records; and when I read the manner of the cross-examination of the memorialists and their witnesses, it seemed to me with all due respect that the committee ought to have interfered before they did, and stopped it. That was my comment on the manner of one, at least, of the counsel, and the one who was subsequently inculpated and tried, without acquittal, before a jury of this District for a shocking offense against the character of an innocent man, to which I referred the other day.

I am not sorry that the Senator has reviewed the subject. It is true that, as compared with the grand amounts with which this District has been accustomed to deal, $20,000, or perhaps a couple of thousand dollars less, may seem a mere flea-bite in the District of Columbia; but in other and in plainer communities, where men work for their living and pay their debts, and do not depend upon the Treasury of the United States to meet every extravagant expense, such an allowance for counsel would be thought very serious; would be considered not compensation for the work of a month, for $20,000 is oftentimes the result of the work almost of a life-time. Here, however, we are so accustomed to these grand amounts of the people's money that it seems a very small affair to pay this much. But when tax-payers and property-holders memorialize Congress to remedy wrongs which they think exist in the way of expenditure, ask for reform in legislation, and employ private counsel at their own expense, is it right that the individuals who have been engaged in alleged violations of law should have their counsel fees paid out of the pockets of their victims, and out of the pockets of an innocent people?

I do not know whether the honorable Senator answered me the other day or not; but his friend from Indiana did, as I understood, answer me that the fees of these counsel had not been paid. That fact we shall hereafter ascertain. I only now repeat that gentlemen of credibility in this District tell me that the fees of these three counsel were paid in 3.65 bonds, the form of part of the payment at least having been by a transfer of a certificate to a national bank in New York that sent here and took bonds in its own name.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BAYARD. Certainly.

Mr. MORTON. I think I did not say that the counsel had not been paid, for I knew nothing about it; but I did state, on the authority of one of the commissioners then present, that they had never paid them, never passed upon the claim; that it had never been before them in any form. They had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the Senate had the idea, and the country had the idea, that when these three gentlemen who are the commissioners took charge of the affairs of this District they had plenary power over the expenditures. Now I am told that the board of public works did certify that this amount was due to their counsel; that it was audited, and that certificates were issued, and that those certificates have been transferred into the shape of 3.65 bonds, upon which the people of this country are paying interest to-day or are summoned to pay interest. It was but as an illustration of the unjustifiable execution of the laws of Congress that I cited the fact that the board of public works, who defended their proceedings so unsuccessfully that Congress almost unanimously legislated them out of power, have called on the people of the country to pay some seventeen thousand or twenty thousand dollars to their private counsel. It certainly was unlawful, it certainly was unjust. I believe the fact to have occurred, and hereafter I shall find, I apprehend, or some committee will find, as I do not think this matter can die here and stand still, that this statement is the simple truth, whether the commission paid the money or not, which is a thing I did not charge. I asked the question of the very ready and able defenders of the commissioners and of the board of public works, and of all that has been the government of Washington for the last five or six years, and they did not answer me, except that the newspaper report which I saw, the Associated Press report, I think, represented the Senator from Indiana as denying that the counsel had been paid out of the Treasury. He now, however, corrects that.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I did not correct it. I simply repeat my statement to the Senator. What I said was, that these commissioners had nothing to do with it. I did not say the money had been paid out of the Treasury or had not, for I did not know anything about that.

Mr. BAYARD. It is merely a question of the construction of this act, whether the commissioners ought not to have had something to do with it. The commissioners, as I understand, were placed in charge of the affairs of this District. They were gentlemen of reputation and character. The powers given them were plenary; and it seems to me that if they allowed such sums of money to be paid for such a purpose they certainly were derelict in their duty. It was an act certainly of omission for which, it seems to me, they must be found fault with. That is all I mean to say.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the Senator with some skill shifts the issue entirely. The question arose on another portion of the speech which he made, and which I expressly notified him of at the time, and not on the part he now refers to as to whether or not the commissioners authorized or failed to prohibit the payment of $20,000 for counsel. The question was not whether or not it was the fault of the board of audit or whether or not it was paid by them. I was not discussing that at that time, and I called his attention distinctly to what it was that I took exception to. I have no remark to make about it now, except to say that by the very law of 1874 all power over claims was withheld from the commissioners and put in the hands of the board of audit and the funding commissioners. But I wish to say, and I call his attention to the fact, that I then reminded him that he used language about browbeating counsel and about their being employed by Shepherd to browbeat witnesses, and Shepherd was the one complained of. Among other crimes which it was alleged that Shepherd and his associates had been guilty of, it was alleged that he had employed counsel to browbeat witnesses, and I said that that phrase implied that he had no business to have counsel there, or was a reflection on the character of the counsel employed. That was where the matter rested, and the Senator said he was content to have it rest there, and he now comes in and says that it was intended as a reflection, or if not as a reflection as a statement, affecting the character or conduct of the counsel employed. I ask him now in regard to the issue there was between the Senator and myself on that occasion whether or not I was right?

Mr. BAYARD. If the Senator asks me the question I will answer. I do not think he was right, because there seems to be, as has been read, an express allegation that it was right and proper for Shepherd to employ counsel. That certainly would do away with any implication of censure because one of the counsel browbeat and rigidly and roughly cross-examined witnesses.

Mr. SARGENT. That was in another part of the speech; and I wished to show him that my memory was right in quoting him on that occasion, and that I quoted him correctly.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from California has seen fit to go to a certain board and to bring from that board a certificate which is not sworn to. I wonder it is not sworn to. I wonder that the Senator from California would go to that trouble. It seems now that my informant, who was a Senator of the United States, was mistaken, in that the resolution had an exception. That is all; nothing else. A resolution was passed, it seems, in which they recognized the necessity as honorable men of not acting under this law by which they claimed the authority to act. I am told most of them are democrats. What care I what their politics are?

Mr. SARGENT. I assure the Senator I do not care.

Mr. EATON. I do not know whether the Senator cares or not. I cannot see why that was brought in unless the Senator from California desires (and so far as that goes, if that is his idea, it has great force) to convince the Senate that because they are democrats they will not do dishonorable things. If that is the intention, I admit there is force in it. I did not stop to inquire what the politics of these gentlemen were. I heard that they had done a certain thing, and after that changed their action. Now, I have no reason to doubt the authenticity of the document produced, nor should I have doubted the word of my friend from California; and when he said that he was so informed by the clerk of that board, it was not necessary that the document should have been brought here; but I say they ought not to have made any exception at all. The very fact that they refused to issue bonds except a certain amount shows that they knew they ought not to issue any at all, because the equity and the legality of those very certificates had been called in question, and therefore the necessity for the action of the Senate yesterday. I express the regret which of course every Senator must feel who makes any statement on information that is not accurate in every respect.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I wish to make a motion that I deem it my duty to make under the circumstances, and that is to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution of yesterday was passed, with a view to strike out the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] I think we ought to do that. I will enter a motion to reconsider and ask that the joint resolution be recalled from the House for that purpose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the joint resolution is still within the possession of the Senate, so that a motion to reconsider is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit a motion to reconsider, and as soon as the morning hour is over I will ask for the vote of the Senate on the motion; or it can be taken up now, as it will take but a moment, I think.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. By common consent the motion to reconsider can lie over for the present. The Chair hears no objection.

PUBLIC LANDS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. CLAYTON. I move to take up the bill that was pending yesterday morning relative to the public lands in certain States.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Senator from Mississippi who sits near me [Mr. BRUCE] saw me yesterday and said that he was quite sick, that he felt great interest in this question and wanted an opportunity to examine it and possibly to be heard upon it. Therefore I must ask the Senate to postpone the consideration of this subject. Every one will see that it is a subject which he naturally should feel interest in, and which the Senate would of course accord him a hearing upon.

Mr. CLAYTON. I had a conversation yesterday with the Senator from Mississippi in relation to this very thing, and I had a conversation with him when I first introduced the bill. He told me yesterday that he was in favor of the bill; and I have no doubt he will support it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. He saw me at the close of the session yesterday and stated that he was very desirious of looking at the law and possibly of being heard upon it. He asked me to get the law for him, which I did.

Mr. CLAYTON. We can proceed with the bill for the present.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope not.

Mr. CLAYTON. Other Senators desire to speak on the subject. We can proceed with the bill, but we need not come to a vote until he comes in.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well; I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.]

Mr. ALCORN. I desire to say that I received a note from my colleague this morning requesting that the vote on the bill shall be postponed, as he desires perhaps to be heard on the subject, and perhaps he may not have made up his mind yet which way he will vote. He simply wants the privilege of looking at the bill and examining into the question.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am perfectly willing he should have that privilege; but if other Senators desire to speak on the bill, I think they may do so now and let us go on with the consideration of it. I will not press a vote to-day.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think under the circumstances, if the Senator allows it to go over at all, it had better go over at once for all purposes, because the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] may call out other remarks. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLAYTON] had better get up his bill at some other time with the purpose of then disposing of it.

Mr. CLAYTON. If this bill is to be considered in the morning hour each day, there will be very little time for that purpose. The difficulty is, that if this bill is allowed to be thrust aside from day to day, after a while all that has been said will be forgotten to a great extent by persons who have not paid as much attention to the bill as others. As I said, I do not desire to urge it to a vote to-day. I ask the Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] if he is ready to proceed with his remarks? He said yesterday that he wished to speak.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not this bill come up as the unfinished business of the morning hour without a motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not in the morning hour. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas to take up the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. My own impression is that it would be a waste of time to proceed with the discussion unless the vote is to be taken at the close of the debate. I have some remarks to make upon the subject; and the longer I reflect upon it the more convinced I am that the importance of the question the Senate is not yet fully aware of. I have no desire to simply talk upon the bill. Whenever it is up for final action I shall be glad to have the opportunity to express my views somewhat more at length.

Mr. CLAYTON. If I can have an understanding that this bill may go over to a certain day and be disposed of on that day, I shall be very glad; but the Senator will readily see that a measure of this kind of so much importance when taken up to-day and discussed ten or fifteen minutes, then going over to to-morrow and being discussed ten or fifteen minutes, and then perhaps not taken up for three or four days again or a week, is not apt to get that consideration which it ought to have. I would be glad if the Senate would give unanimous consent to allow the bill to come up on some particular day. I do not know what day I can mention, however. I understand some other measures are likely to be brought forward at the expiration of the question in relation to the seat of the Senator from Louisiana. After that is disposed of, I understand there are other measures likely to be of more paramount importance probably than this.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have but ten minutes of the morning hour left, and it is idle to take up this question for ten minutes. We may dispose of the other matter as to the District bonds in that time, perhaps.

Mr. CLAYTON. Let it go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I know the bill ought to be considered and acted upon, and I will vote with the Senator to take it up. Now I ask for a vote on the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the District bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I withdraw my motion.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] moves a reconsideration of the vote by which the Senate yesterday passed the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that all votes be reconsidered to enable us to get to that stage of the bill which will enable us to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was ordered to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on ordering the amendments to be engrossed and the resolution to be read a third time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move now to strike out the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. WITHERS. The proper course, I think, would be to move to reconsider the vote on that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The motion to strike it out reaches the same thing. I do not care which form is adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order to strike out what the Senate has already adopted. The Senator can move to reconsider the vote on concurrence.

Mr. SHERMAN. I make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was concurred in.

Mr. EATON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that the attention of Senators has been called to this matter sufficiently. The Senator from Connecticut yesterday offered an amendment which prohibited the payment of interest on bonds of the United States issued after a certain date, on the ground, as he stated, that those bonds were issued in violation of a resolution of the sinking-fund commissioners—a fact so plainly implying that they were wrongfully or fraudulently issued that as soon as the Senator from Connecticut made that statement, I and every Senator unanimously agreed to suspend the payment on the bonds, which, according to the implications at least of the statement, were wrongfully, fraudulently, or improperly issued, in violation of a resolution of the sinking-fund commissioners themselves. A paper has been read this morning, which I suppose has been heard by all the Senators, showing clearly that that was an error; that though there have been some bonds issued since the passage of this bill in the House, they were issued in pursuance of the resolution, and were bonds issued upon applications made and certificates filed with the sinking-fund commissioners before the passage of the bill by the House of Representatives. They therefore are like any other bonds of the United States outstanding.

It seems to me, under these circumstances, that it would be very wrong, a clear and palpable violation of the public faith, to refuse to pay interest on bonds legally and properly issued in plain pursuance of law and in plain pursuance of the direction given to and the authority conferred upon these sinking-fund commissioners. The statement made already by the Senator from California shows that there can be no party feeling about this matter, because it turns out that all the members of this board of sinking-fund commissioners are democrats, not the more honest on that account, (for I do not agree at all to that suggestion which some Senator has made,) but it shows distinctly, the treasurer being a republican and the commissioners being democrats, that this was an authority exercised fairly, honestly, and in pursuance of law. It is not right for the Senate of the United States to arrest the payment of interest on bonds of that character; and I have felt it my duty, as I promptly assented to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, on his raising a doubt of the honesty or legality of this transaction, to move a reconsideration merely to get rid of that amendment, and then let the bill go back to the House of Representatives.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the vote is taken on this motion to reconsider, I wish to inquire as to the effect on subsequent amendments to the bill of striking out the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. After the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut, there were various other amendments which I take it were in the nature of amendments to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, and the question I wish to be informed upon is as to the effect now upon all the subsequent amendments of striking out the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. If the effect is to destroy all subsequent amendments, then I think the motion of the Senator from Ohio is very objectionable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is the last amendment. There is no subsequent amendment, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SHERMAN. My purpose is to strike out that clause which was put in under a misapprehension.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask that the amendment be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment, the vote on which it is now proposed to reconsider.

The Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That this resolution shall not in any way or manner recognize the liability of the United States to pay either the principal or interest of any of such bonds as may have been issued on or since the 27th day of January, 1876.

Mr. MAXEY. That is the amendment to be reconsidered, I understand.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I want to inquire of the Senator from Ohio whether it is his understanding that no such bonds have been issued as matter of fact?

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand distinctly that such bonds have been issued to the amount of $150,000; issued in pursuance of the resolution referred to by the Senator from Connecticut, upon applications made before the passage of this bill in the House of Representatives, and that these parties were therefore entitled to them, and that they were legally issued by the unanimous direction of the board of sinking-fund commissioners.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. One thing more. Does this motion affect any other part of the bill than that proviso?

Mr. SHERMAN. Not at all. It cannot have any effect except on that amendment which was adopted without a division yesterday.

Mr. EATON. So far as the Senator from Ohio stated, the application he made of my remarks was correct; but he did not state all. I do not object to his stating part of what I said. The amendment is a proper amendment without any regard to the action of that board. The amendment was prepared before I knew that there had been any resolution, and its preparation had nothing to do in my mind with the action of the board in regard to that resolution. The alleged fact, which turns out not to have been true, I learned here after the amendment was prepared. Now I say that after this business had been taken up in the House of Representatives the board were culpable—democrats or republicans, I care not what their politics are—in issuing any more bonds. They ought not then to have issued a single bond until after the action of Congress, and Congress ought never to pass the bill which is now before the Senate until after the whole subject has been investigated by a committee of the Senate or of the other House or a joint committee. In my judgment there are hundreds of thousands of dollars of these bonds which were issued upon inadequate securities, improper vouchers. I have no doubt about it. The Senator from Ohio may differ with me in that particular.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know anything about it.

Mr. EATON. Well, we ought to know something about it before we pass a bill of this character. We ought to know something about it when the whole city is full of rumors against the character and equity of these claims.

I think this amendment is a proper one. I shall not vote for the bill; I did not yesterday. I will not vote for this bill, or any bill of this character, until after a committee have examined and investigated into the subject; but I trust the amendment will remain. There is reason enough for it, in that a board, after this matter had been taken up by Congress, proceeded to issue new bonds.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I hope I shall be pardoned for a very brief suggestion about this matter. I think the amendment adopted, with or without the information, ought to stand. It simply provides that there shall be no implication from this resolution against the Government of the United States in reference to any bonds issued since the 27th of January. Prior to the 25th of January the House of Representatives had passed this joint resolution, declaring, in the language of the first proviso, "that any further issue of 3.65 bonds is hereby prohibited." The joint resolution had been transmitted here, and was received in the Senate on the 25th of January, when, as the record shows, it was "read twice and referred to the Committee on Appropriations."

Now, I submit to Senators that where men were acting, as these commissioners were, under a power from Congress, and one House has passed a bill forbidding any further issue of the bonds, it is not right or proper for the commissioners to continue issuing them while the subject is under consideration in Congress. No agent of a business concern which had given ever so broad a power of attorney would continue to issue negotiable paper when the principal was investigating his acts and claiming that he had exceeded his authority. It seems to me, therefore, that, on the face of these proceedings, we should retain this provision. We do not say in it that the bonds are void or illegal; but we say that we will not recognize the validity of bonds which have been issued by these agents within the very shadow of the Capitol after one House of Congress has forbidden it and the other is considering that prohibition.

We can deal justly with all those who have claims, leaving this provision in, and by leaving it in we can protect the tax-payers of the District and the tax-payers of the Union, who are to pay their share, by saying that, while we appropriate interest to be paid on the prior bonds, we will withhold the payment of interest on these until we can look into them; and there ought not to be much interest on bonds issued since the 27th of January, unless there is something about them which I do not understand. I think it is just to all. We prejudge nobody; but we simply say that while we will pay interest upon prior bonds, as to these which have been issued after one body of Congress said more should not be issued and the other was acting upon the question, we will not pay at present. I do not care who the agents are. I would say we should guard against ratifying their action until we look into it, and then we will do what is right.

SENATOR FROM LOUISIANA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired. The resolution for the admission of P. B. S. Pinchback is the unfinished business.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. MORTON on the 5th of March, 1875:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback be admitted as a Senator from the State of Louisiana for the term of six years beginning the 4th day of March, 1873.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] to insert the word "not" before "admitted."

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I shall only detain the Senate a short time this morning. This question has been before this body several times, and ought to have been long ago decided. The time has come when it ought to be decided in justice to the people and in justice to the State of Louisiana. One thing is certain: the State of Louisiana is entitled to have another Senator on this floor. If Mr. Pinchback was not elected to the Senate, then the present Legislature is entitled to fill the vacancy. This proposition is indisputable, and this body has no right, upon one pretext or another, to keep the State from its representation.

Whether Mr. Eustis has been elected in accordance with the forms of law has not been examined by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and they have made no report upon that; but one thing is certain, that if Mr. Pinchback was not elected, the present Legislature of Louisiana is entitled to fill the vacancy; and whether it has been filled by the election of Mr. Eustis may not now be a material question, though I cannot see why the forms of law have not been complied with in his case if there is a vacancy; and that is the only question, it seems to me, that is before the Senate at this time.

Before coming to the question of law, on which I wish to make a brief statement, I want to refer very briefly to a matter which it is due to Mr. Pinchback to notice in answer to a report that has been in circulation to the effect that he was disloyal during the war. I have had placed in my hands the military record of Mr. Pinchback during the war, and I invite Senators to give it their attention very briefly.

Mr. Pinchback was living in Memphis at the time of the capture of New Orleans by the national forces in 1862. He immediately went to New Orleans. Some time afterward he obtained from General Butler the following authority:

NEW ORLEANS, August 27, 1862.

By authority vested in me by Major-General B. F. Butler, Pinckney Pinchback is hereby authorized to recruit a company of Louisiana volunteers for the United States Army.

S. H. STAFFORD,
Superintendent Recruiting Arrangements.

Then follows a memorandum as to where Mr. Pinchback's company was to rendezvous. Mr. Pinchback raised his company and received a commission as captain in the Army of the United States, in what was known as the Corps d'Afrique, a colored regiment raised in the city of New Orleans, and here is his commission as captain, signed by "Benjamin F. Butler, major-general commanding," who had authority from the Government of the United States to raise that legion. This commission bears date October 6, 1862, appointing him a captain in the Army of the United States. On it is indorsed the oath taken by Mr. Pinchback—what is known as the iron-clad oath. The first officers of that regiment were colored men. Examinations were instituted as to their qualifications, and all were found disqualified except Mr. Pinchback. He passed the examination. As the colored officers were mustered out, white officers were mustered into their places; and after the regiment was officered by white men his position became exceedingly uncomfortable, and they sought to drive him out of the regiment. He found himself in a position where he could render no valuable service, and he tendered his resignation in these words:

FORT PIKE, Louisiana, September 10, 1863—

He had then been in the service over one year, and had served honorably—

GENERAL: In the organization of the regiment I am attached to, (Twentieth Corps d'Afrique,) I find nearly all the officers inimical to me, and I can foresee nothing but dissatisfaction and discontent, which will make my position very disagreeable indeed. I would, therefore, respectfully tender my resignation, as I am confident that by so doing I best serve the interest of the regiment.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

P. B. S. PINCHBACK,
Captain Second Louisiana National Guard.

The resignation was accepted and he was honorably discharged. I have the discharge here:

[Special Orders No. 227.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, September 11, 1863.

[Extract.]

The following-named officer, having tendered his resignation as such, is hereby honorably discharged from the military service of the United States: Captain P. B. S. Pinchback, Second Louisiana National Guard.

By command of Major-General Banks.

G. NORMAN LIEBER,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

Then comes the certificate of Nicholas Vedder, paymaster United States Army:

I certify that the foregoing is a true copy from the original, and that I have this day paid Captain P. B. S. Pinchback the sum of $521.95, in full to date of his discharge.

NICHOLAS VEDDER,
Paymaster United States Army.

NEW ORLEANS, LOUISIANA, September 19, 1863.

But Mr. Pinchback was not content to remain out of the service of the United States, and he applied to General Banks, who was then in command of New Orleans, for authority to raise a cavalry company, and he received that authority October 2, 1863, in Special Orders No. 8:

2. Mr. Pinchback having reported for duty, under authority from Colonel J. G. Wilson, to raise a company of cavalry, is hereby ordered to recruit in the city of New Orleans, and will be governed by the following instructions.

Then follow the details as to the matter of enlistment. This is signed by "J. S. Bangs, jr., lieutenant-colonel and superintendent recruiting service." Mr. Pinchback went on, raised his company at an expense to himself of nearly $1,000, and after the company had been recruited he thus applied for his commission as captain of the company:

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CAVALRY, CORPS D'AFRIQUE,
New Orleans, November 17, 1863.

MAJOR: By authority from Major James Grant Wilson (copy inclosed) I have recruited a company for the First Cavalry Regiment Corps d'Afrique, and would respectfully apply for my commission in order to be mustered in with my company.

I have the honor, sir, to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

PINCKNEY B. S. PINCHBACK.

MAJOR G. NORMAN LIEBER,
Acting Assistant Adjutant-General, Department of the Gulf.

On that application the following indorsement is made, (I have the original paper here:)

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CAVALRY, CORPS D'AFRIQUE,
New Orleans, Louisiana, November 17, 1863.

Pinchback, P. B. S., appointed captain First Cavalry, Corps d'Afrique, states that he has recruited his company, and asks that a commission be issued to him.

One inclosure.

HEADQUARTERS FIRST CAVALRY, CORPS D'AFRIQUE,
New Orleans, Louisiana, November 17, 1863.

Respectfully forwarded.

W. W. HOWE,
Commissioned as Major or Commander.

Here comes the indorsement on the back by the officers in command:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT GULF,
New Orleans, November 16, 1863.

Respectfully referred to Lieutenant-Colonel Bangs. Is not this officer colored?

By command of Major-General Banks.

J. SCHUYLER CROSBY,
Captain and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

And here is the return on the part of Mr. Bangs:

Respectfully returned.

P. B. S. Pinchback is a colored man; very much of a gentleman, however, and a meritorious officer.

It would afford me much pleasure to see him placed in a position to serve the Government.

I. S. BANGS, JR.,
Lieutenant-Colonel and Superintendent Recruiting, Corps d'Afrique.

After that return had been made by the colonel we find this indorsement by General Banks:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE GULF,
New Orleans, November 19.

Respectfully returned.

This application is disapproved, the commissioning of negroes as commissioned officers being contrary to law.

By command of Major-General Banks.

I. SCHUYLER CROSBY,
Captain and Acting Assistant Adjutant-General.

It will thus be seen that Mr. Pinchback was in the service of the United States for more than a year, that he raised two companies, that he was recommended highly for a commission as a gentleman and a meritorious officer, but that his commission was refused in the cavalry company upon the ground that it was contrary to law to commission a negro.

Mr. MERRIMON. Before the Senator passes from that point, I beg to ask him whether he has any information as to where Mr. Pinchback was at the time and immediately preceding the time when General Butler gave him this permission to raise a company.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. Pinchback was in New Orleans, as I understand. Will the Senator state the object of his inquiry? I presume I understand it. I ask him to be frank about it, and I will answer him frankly.

Mr. MERRIMON. I will state my object in all frankness. I have heard it stated on what I regard as pretty good authority that at that time he was in the penitentiary or workhouse of Louisiana for the crime of burglary, having been committed there by order of a provost court.

Mr. MORTON. For what crime?

Mr. MERRIMON. I think burglary; either burglary or larceny. If the Senator has any information on that subject, I should be obliged to him for it, and I am sure the Senate would.

Mr. MORTON. I believe I am in possession of the information precisely that the Senator seeks for, and supposing the question would be asked I brought the papers along. I did not care in my statement to refer to that circumstance, because it is necessarily a painful one, but I am glad the Senator has made the inquiry as a matter of justice to Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. MERRIMON. It seemed to me a material fact, and therefore I inquired about it.

Mr. MORTON. I have a memorandum here which has been placed in my hands containing the facts.

Mr. Pinchback, in the spring of 1862, being in Memphis, Tennessee, within the confederate military lines, heartily sympathizing with the national efforts to preserve the integrity of the union of the States and the authority of the Federal Government, so soon as he heard that New Orleans had fallen into the hands of United States troops, made his way to Louisiana and arrived in the Crescent City May the 12th, 1862. Shortly after his arrival, under great provocation, he was forced into a personal collision with Mr. John Kepper, his opponent being wounded in the fight.

I am otherwise assured that Mr. Pinchback acted simply in self-defense. He was arrested and gave bail on a charge of assault and battery; and I am advised that that is the only charge that was brought against him; no burglary, no larceny, no infamous crime; and if any Senator has any evidence on the point, I am advised by Mr. Pinchback that he challenges him to produce it.

He was placed under bonds on the charge of assault and battery by Judge Louis Gostinel, a civil officer, and so remained until Mr. Kepper recovered.

The man got well very speedily.

Pending the proceedings in the civil courts, Kepper—

I am told he was his brother-in-law—

at the investigation of parties who were attempting to levy black mail, caused Mr. Pinchback to be arrested on the 22d of May, only ten days after the assault, the party having meanwhile recovered, and to be brought before Provost Judge Joseph M. Bell.

then the military officer who commanded the city of New Orleans, by whom Mr. Pinchback, was sent to a prison known as the workhouse. In that prison he remained some time, I do not know how long, perhaps a month, or until the matter was brought to the knowledge of the military authorities, and Mr. Pinchback was discharged, there being no ground for his detention. I have here a transcript from the records of the prison; it is a printed form:

Name of prisoner, Pinkney Pinchback; age, 24; height, 5 ft. 9¼ ins.; color of hair, black; color of eyes, black; where born, Georgia; education, educated; occupation, laborer; habits, intemperate.

I suppose the fact was at the time this collision occurred both he and his brother-in-law were somewhat convivial—a thing which does not very often occur in the South, and of course never with white men. [Laughter.]

When committed, May 23, 1862; time to serve, 2 years; when discharged, July 28, 1862.

Mr. MERRIMON. What is the charge?

Mr. MORTON. I will find that in another paper perhaps. Here is the certificate:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, STATE OF LOUISIANA.

PARISH OF ORLEANS,
City of New Orleans:

SECOND JUSTICE'S COURT.

Personally came and appeared before me, W. L. Evans, second justice of the peace in and for the parish of Orleans, Patrick Creagh, a resident of this city, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That in the year of 1862 he was assistant keeper of the work-house of the parish of Orleans, Louisiana, and that he knows P. B. S. Pinchback; that said Mr. Pinchback was in said year, 1862, committed to said work-house by Judge Bell, provost judge of the parish of Orleans, for the offense of assault and battery; that said Mr. Pinchback was so committed to the work-house without a trial by jury and without having an opportunity to call witnesses in his own behalf and defense, and without being heard by counsel, all, as this deponent believes, in violation of law and justice; that, soon after said confinement in the work-house as aforesaid and upon a full and fair statement of his case to Judge Bell, and upon showing that great injustice had been done Mr. P. B. S. Pinchback, Judge Bell released him. Deponent further says that he really believes that Mr. Pinchback was committed as aforesaid by Judge Bell through the influence of evil-disposed persons who desired to extort money from said Mr. Pinchback. This deponent was told by one Mr. C. C. Morgan, who at that time was practicing law in said provost court, that if said Pinchback would pay him (Morgan) $500 he would obtain his release, but that Mr. Pinchback, conscious of his innocence, refused to pay said amount to said Morgan or any one else.

PATRICK CREAGH.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this 7th day of January, 1874.

W. L. EVANS,
Second Justice of the Peace.

Mr. MERRIMON. Is there a blank there for the charge or is it inserted?

Mr. MORTON. No, I do not see a blank here for the charge; there is no blank for the charge.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to see the paper?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly; I will hand it over.

I do certify the above to be a true and correct statement, and the only record in this institution regarding the incarceration of Senator P. B. S. Pinchback to this place.

Very respectfully,

CHRIS. C. CAIN,
Clerk City Work-House.

I have here an affidavit which I will read:

I do certify the above to be a true and correct statement, and the only record.

Here is another affidavit:

Personally came and appeared before me, W. L. Evans, second justice of the peace, &c., Robert N. Johnson, a resident of this city, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says: That he was the clerk of the city work-house in 1866 and 1867, and had charge of the records, among which was the commitment against Mr. P. B. S. Pinchback for assault and battery—

It seems the commitment was for assault and battery—on one John Kepper. Knows all the facts. * * * Deponent further states that application has been made to the present keeper of said work-house for said commitment, but that it cannot be found; therefore he verily believes it is lost or mislaid.

Mr. MERRIMON. What was the offense charged?

Mr. MORTON. Assault and battery. This affidavit states that the commitment was for assault and battery.

Now I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that immediately after, or in a very short time after, this had taken place, and he was released, Pinchback was commissioned by General Butler to raise a company; that he raised a company and was in the Army for thirteen months, and then resigned because all the officers had become white except himself, and his staying was disagreeable. He was then authorized by General Banks to raise a cavalry company, which he did successfully in the same city at a cost of nearly $1,000, and was then refused a commission, after being recommended by the superintendent of the recruiting service as being a gentleman and a meritorious officer, upon the ground that the law did not authorize the appointment of a negro.

Mr. Pinchback was elected to the constitutional convention in Louisiana from the city of New Orleans in 1868, and he served in that convention with some distinction. When the State was reconstructed, he was elected a member of the senate from the city of New Orleans for the term of four years. That would carry him over to 1872. In 1871 the lieutenant-governor of the State, Mr. Dunn, a colored man, died, and Mr. Pinchback was elected to fill the vacancy as president of the Senate. By the constitution of Louisiana, when the lieutenant-governor dies the president of the senate becomes the lieutenant-governor, not ex officio lieutenant-governor, but the constitution declares he "shall be the lieutenant-governor." Pinchback served as lieutenant-governor of the State of Louisiana from the month of October, 1871, until December, 1872, some fourteen months. When Warmoth was impeached in December, 1872, Pinchback became the governor of the State under the constitution of Louisiana, and continued to act until his successor, William P. Kellogg, was duly installed in office. This I believe is his military and his official history.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to state very briefly the points of law that I think are involved in this case. Mr. Pinchback is certified by the governor of the State of Louisiana to have been elected a Senator to this body for six years, beginning on the 4th of March, 1873. That election took place in January, 1873. His right to a seat was questioned here, and one year afterward, when the same Legislature came together, he was re-elected by that body, and the certificate is here in the case of both elections.

In the first place, I insist that Mr. Pinchback has a prima facie title to his seat. The certificate of the governor makes a prima facie case, which entitles the person holding it to a seat; and if there is any objection to his election as having been informal or fraudulent or not by the proper body, that is a question which under the usage of this Senate from the very time of its organization is to be inquired into afterward. It is the common law of this body, it is the common law of the House of Representatives, that the person holding the certificate of election issued by the governor in pursuance of the law has a prima facie title to his seat, and if there be objections upon account of fraud, informality, or that he was not elected by the proper body, they are to be inquired into afterward. Even in the case where the question is whether he was elected by the proper Legislature this has been the rule. The first case involving that question arose in Rhode Island many years ago. In that case the Legislature of Rhode Island, then sitting under the old charter, had protracted the existence of the State senate one year after the term of the senators would have expired, there having been no election. The Legislature by a joint resolution continued the existence of that senate as a part of the Legislature for one year, and after its existence had thus been continued by a joint resolution the Legislature elected a Senator, and the governor, whose existence depended upon the same action, certified to the election. The next summer an election took place, a Legislature unquestionably legal was elected, and the new Legislature elected another Senator, and both credentials came to this body. Both applicants appeared here claiming a seat. The Senate, under the lead of Mr. Clay, from Kentucky, who was then a member of this body, declared that the Senator first elected having the certificate of the governor had a prima facie title to the seat, and that as to whether he was elected by the right body or not was a question that could only be inquired into after he had taken his seat. Accordingly, Mr. Robbins was sworn in; and after he was sworn in a very lengthy and very interesting investigation followed as to whether he was elected by the Legislature of Rhode Island. It was a very close question as to whether the old Legislature had the power to protract the existence of the senate one year by a joint resolution; but it was finally held that it had that power, and Mr. Robbins was maintained in his seat.

We have had another case here very recently involving the same question, and that was in the case of Mr. SPENCER, from Alabama. Mr. SPENCER held the certificate of the governor of the State as having been elected by the Legislature of Alabama. Another gentleman came here claiming to have been elected by the Legislature of Alabama. We seated Mr. SPENCER upon the ground that he held the certificate of the governor and had a prima facie case. We then made inquiry in regard to the facts, and we found that there were two pretended legislatures in the State of Alabama, one called the court-house legislature and the other called the capitol legislature. The court-house legislature elected Mr. SPENCER and the capitol legislature elected Mr. Sykes. So the committee reported, and the Senate decided that Mr. SPENCER was elected by the lawful Legislature of Alabama.

In the House, I believe, the same rule has prevailed, that the member having the certificate of the governor has a prima facie case, and when it is alleged that he was not properly elected, or elected by fraud, or that the election was in any way illegal, that is a question that is to be examined after that time.

I know, Mr. President, there is an old controversy in regard to the election in Louisiana in 1872. That I do not care to go into now. Of course I shall follow the discussion if it becomes necessary. It is enough to say that Governor Kellogg has been recognized by every department of this Government—by the President, by the Senate, and by the House of Representatives. The present House, a large majority being democratic, have recognized him in the fullest and in the most ample manner as the governor of the State by seating on his certificate, after sharp resistance, I believe, two members of the House whose only title was that they held the certificate of the governor of the State of Louisiana. What there was behind that the House did not know. Objection was made that Kellogg was not the governor of Louisiana, but the House decided that he was the governor of Louisiana by recognizing the certificate and placing two members in their seats by virtue of it. Here we have a recognition by a democratic House of Representatives in the fullest possible manner. There is no room for nice distinctions or for hair splitting so far as the action of the House is concerned. With a full knowledge of all the facts the House of Representatives placed those two members in their seats.

I may say that Governor Kellogg has been recognized by all the courts in Louisiana time and time again by the lower courts and by the supreme court, I believe, of the State in several decisions. The Legislature of Louisiana has been recognized by the highest courts in that State as being the lawful Legislature of the State. This Legislature that elected Pinchback passed more than two hundred statutes which are to-day recognized as the laws of Louisiana, and are enforced in all the courts, one of which has been recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WEST. And submitted constitutional amendments to the people that have been ratified.

Mr. MORTON. The very Legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback submitted several constitutional amendments to the people which were ratified by the votes of all parties, and have since been put into operation by laws enacted for that purpose, acting even with regard to the most important interests of the State with reference to their public debt. I may here say, I suppose, in general terms, that the courts of Louisiana and the people of Louisiana of all parties have recognized Governor Kellogg as the governor and the Legislature that elected Mr. Pinchback as the Legislature in every particular except one, and that one is simply the election of P. B. S. Pinchback. Amendments of the constitution in regard to the city of New Orleans, a city under democratic government, asked for by the leading men of that city, were tendered by the same session of the Legislature electing Mr. Pinchback and ratified, and under which the city of New Orleans is now conducting its government.

I have frequently argued the question before the Senate, and I do not propose to do it now, that so far as members of that legislature are concerned and the State officers, their title is to be determined by the State tribunals appointed for that purpose. The State returning board, authorized by law for the express purpose of counting the votes, had exclusive jurisdiction upon that subject, so far as the State officers were concerned. The Legislature, of course, after it convenes and organizes, is made the judge of the qualification and election of its own members. The State courts have passed upon the State elections by recognizing the governer and the Legislature and the legality of the board that counted the votes, and the general rule of law is that the Supreme Court of the United States will follow the decisions of the State courts upon any question arising exclusively under the constitution and laws of a State. That was held very fully in the case of Luther vs. Borden, and has been frequently recognized as the law.

There has been trouble down there, Mr. President; there have been things done on both sides that I cannot justify; but I want to say right here that the root of all the trouble in Louisiana grew out of a conspiracy and a combination to subvert a notorious republican majority of from fifteen to twenty thousand, by violence and fraud. That State was republican in 1872 just as notoriously as the State of Kentucky was democratic in 1875, and there is abundance of evidence upon the record to show that a scheme was formed, not only formed but avowed, to subvert and defeat that well-known majority and to put the democratic party in power. I do not say that everything that was done to defeat that scheme was right; I do not intend to be drawn into the justification of anything that was wrong; but I say here to-day that the origin and root of this whole trouble was a foul conspiracy to rob the people of Louisiana of their political rights and defeat and to overwhelm a well-known majority of from fifteen to twenty thousand—a scheme that has been recently followed in the State of Mississippi, and a scheme, too, that was followed in other States and is threatened to be pursued in other elections yet to come.

I will not now advert to the sad history of Mississippi during the last campaign and election. Louisiana was not alone; Mississippi was not alone. I have here the statement and the confession of one of the most distinguished citizens of the State of Georgia, recently made, as to the course that was pursued in that State. I refer to it to show that it was somewhat of a general policy in those States. Robert Toombs, once a member of this body, a man of distinguished talents, now perhaps the most distinguished citizen of Georgia in many respects, made a speech before the members of the Legislature of that State the other day, only about a week or ten days ago, in the city of Atlanta. He addressed the members of the Legislature and a large mass of people. I have here a verbatim report of his speech in a democratic newspaper, the Daily Constitutionalist, showing that he spoke the sentiments of that people, that he was applauded to the very echo, and that, whatever may be said here, the sentiments and the facts stated by Robert Toombs in that speech were indorsed by the unanimous and hearty plaudits of his auditory.

I do not read this on account of the bitterness of Mr. Toombs; we all know that he is a bitter man; but that he does to-day represent what may be called the vital part of the democratic party of Georgia, of Mississippi, and other southern States, I do not doubt for a moment; but I read this extract from his speech for the purpose of getting his evidence as to a fact, a fact understood at the time and believed by most of us. I now quote simply his testimony without regard to any violent sentiments he utters against the republican party or the people of the North.

Mr. Toombs said:

> We got a good many honest fellows into the first Legislature, but I will tell you how we got them there. I will tell you the truth. The newspapers won't tell it to you. We got them there by carrying the black vote by intimidation and bribery! [laughter,] and I helped to do it! [Applause.] I would have scorned the people if they had not done it! And I will buy them as long as they put beasts to go to the ballot-box! [Cheers.] No man should be given the elective franchise who has not the intelligence to use it properly. The rogue should not have it, for government is made to punish him; the fool should not have it, for government is made to take care of him. Now, these miserable wretches—the Yankees—have injected five millions of savages into the stomach of our body-politic, and the man who says he accepts negro suffrage, I say accursed be he! [Cheers.] I will accept everything, I will accept Grant and empire, before I will accept such a democrat. [Applause.] The poor, ignorant negro—talk of him governing you and me! It takes the highest order of intellect to govern the people, and these poor wretches talk of governing us! Why, they can't perpetuate their own negro power. In the countries where they were in the majority they did not preserve their power and perpetuate their rule. My remedy helped us to break that up. We carried them with us by bribery and intimidation! I advised it and paid my money for it! [Applause.] You all know it, but won't say it. But I will say it, for I fear no man, and am prepared to render an account to none but the great Judge, before whom I must appear in a few years, for my enemies have thought my services to my country so great that they have done me the honor to exclude me from again serving my people.

There is very much in this speech that would be interesting as illustrating the condition of feeling in Georgia and other States, the existence of which I regret as profoundly as anybody.

Now, Mr. President, I have concluded about all that I intended to say. You are now called upon to decide this question, and I hope will do it promptly. The State of Louisiana is entitled to be represented. Shall the men who contrived the scheme of 1872 reap the fruits of it? Pinchback has been kept out of his seat, and there is now a democratic Senator knocking at the door asking for admission. I undertake to say that it is one or the other. The State is entitled to be represented. If Mr. Pinchback is not elected, then the present Legislature is entitled to fill the vacancy. I do not hesitate to say so; and our democratic friends understand full well that, after Mr. Pinchback has been rejected, if he should be rejected, republicans will not stultify themselves, after a decision like that, by keeping the State unrepresented. Distasteful as this gentleman might be to us politically, distasteful as his military record might be to us, still if there is a vacancy that the present Legislature has filled by his election he is entitled to his seat, without now going into the particular circumstances of his election. If irregularities should be found in that, it would simply devolve on the Legislature the necessity of having another election, and the result would be precisely the same.

It does seem to me that we cannot refuse to Mr. Pinchback his seat, except by the violation of principles of law that have been recognized and acted upon in this body from the time of its organization and in the other House, and I may say in all elective bodies in this country.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Mr. President, I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After thirty minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened.

DISTRICT 3.65 BONDS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move to take up the joint resolution relating to the payment of interest on 3.65 bonds.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now ask leave to withdraw my motion to reconsider the vote on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] I do not desire longer to delay the passage of the joint resolution; and as I find the matter will lead to debate, I ask leave to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection the motion to reconsider will be withdrawn, and the amendments made as in the Committee of the Whole will be considered as concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STEVENSON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at two o'clock and twenty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 4, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DELEGATION OF VIRGINIA LEGISLATURE.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask unanimous consent that the privileges of the floor be extended during to-day and to-morrow to a delegation from the State of Virginia, composed in part of a deputation of the joint committee on immigration of the Legislature.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

CIRCUIT COURT IN CALIFORNIA, OREGON, AND NEVADA.

Mr. KNOTT. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask unanimous consent to report back, with an amendment, for consideration at this time, Senate bill No. 53, fixing the time of holding the circuit court of the United States in the districts of California, Oregon and Nevada. It is highly important that the bill and amendment should be acted on immediately, so as not to interfere with the term of the district court of California which will commence next Monday week.

The bill was read. It provides that a term of the circuit court of the United States for the districts of California, Oregon, and Nevada shall be held as follows: For the district of California, on the first Monday of February, second Monday of July, and fourth Monday of November in each year; for the district of Oregon, on the second Monday of April and the first Monday of October in each year; and for the district of Nevada, on the third Monday of March and the first Monday of November in each year. These terms respectively are to be in place of those now provided by law.

The second section provides that the act shall take effect on the 1st day of February, 1876, and repeals all provisions of law inconsistent with it.

The amendment of the committee, which was read, was to strike out near the beginning of the second section the word "February," and insert "March."

There being no objection, the amendment was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to suggest to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. KNOTT] whether it is not necessary to insert a clause to provide for continuing recognizance and process for the new terms?

Mr. KNOTT. That is already provided for.

The bill was passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Several MEMBERS called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty-two minutes past twelve o'clock. The regular order this morning is the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I suppose that the bill which was pending when the morning hour expired yesterday comes up first.

The SPEAKER. O, no; that will come up in a morning hour not devoted by the rules of the House to other business. The morning hour of Friday is assigned to the consideration of private business.

LAWSON & BREWIS.

Mr. TUCKER. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report as a substitute for a bill heretofore referred to them a bill (H. R. No. 1807) for the relief of Anthony Lawson, surviving partner of the firm of Lawson & Brewis of Alexandria, Virginia. The bill is accompanied with a written report. This firm were the owners of certain lots of land in the city of Alexandria sold under the direct-tax law of Congress of 1862. The proceeds of the sale were paid into the Treasury; and this bill proposes to repay those proceeds to the surviving partner of the firm, deducting the amount of the tax, costs, and charges. I ask that the bill be now considered and passed.

Mr. CLYMER. As I understand, this bill is liable to a point of order.

Mr. TUCKER. The question is whether this is to be considered an appropriation out of the Treasury, as the bill merely proposes to repay the proceeds of the sale which were paid into the Treasury. But, even though the bill may be subject to the point of order, I think there will be no objection to its being acted on and passed now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. We are entitled to have the bill read before the point of order is decided.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that this bill, under the rules, because it makes appropriations of lands, must be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the point of order is well taken.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask the gentleman from Michigan not to insist upon his objection at this time. With a brief explanation I have no doubt the House will consent to the passage of the bill at this time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There are similar bills to be reported from the Committee on War Claims, and if we consider this without reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar we must consider those bills in the same manner. I think the enforcement of the rule had better be insisted upon.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN V. CHAPMAN.

Mr. BRADLEY, from the Committee of Claims, submitted an adverse report in the case of John V. Chapman; which was laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN. I am directed by the Committee on War Claims to submit the following resolution for consideration at this time:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on War Claims be, and are hereby, authorized to employ a messenger for the present session at the rate of compensation of a laborer.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hardly think that is in order on a private-bill day.

The SPEAKER. To-day, under the rules, is devoted to the consideration of private bills. Does the gentleman make objection?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not think this resolution to authorize the employment of a messenger by the Committee on War Claims can be considered in the nature of private business.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how he can hold this as a private bill or business of a private nature, and, objection having been made, it will not be received at this time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not insist on my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the adoption of the resolution?

There was no objection; and the resolution was adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair wishes to say, from the manifest desire on the part of the House to facilitate the transaction of this kind of business, it has not been usual to object to these things, although they are not in order.

DANIEL WORMER.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain private land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, with the recommendation that it do pass; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ANDREW WILLIAMS.

Mr. LAPHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report back House bill No. 859, for the benefit of Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee, with the recommendation that it do pass, with the single amendment of striking out "Commissioner of the General Land Office" and inserting "Commissioner of Pensions."

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that this bill must be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. LAPHAM. This bill merely provides for giving relief to Andrew Williams, of Weakley County, Tennessee, for disability at the land office, so that he may obtain a certificate for relocation; but for the death of B. R. McNabb, the relief would have been obtained at the land office, without any bill by Congress.

The SPEAKER. In the judgment of the Chair the objection goes to the very verge in cases of this kind, but still is within the rule. The rule now seems to exclude bills making any appropriation of land in any way. This, in one sense, does that thing. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

The bill and amendment were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ANDERSON J. SMITH.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 597) for the relief of Anderson J. Smith, with the recommendation that it do pass; and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILBER F. CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. GLOVER, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 81) for the relief of Wilber F. Chamberlain, of Lewis County, Missouri, with the recommendation that it do pass, and the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

CLOTHING TO ENLISTED MEN.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported joint resolution (H. R. No. 58) authorizing an issue of clothing to certain enlisted men of Company C, Sixth United States Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

OSCAR F. STANTON.

Mr. LEWIS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely a bill (H. R. No. 398) to restore Oscar F. Stanton, of the United States Navy, to the relative position on the Navy Register which he formerly occupied; and the same was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

R. L. LAW.

Mr. LEWIS also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back adversely the memorial of R. L. Law, commander in the United States Navy, asking for restoration to his proper rank in the naval service of the United States; and the same was laid on the table.

G. HARRIS HEAP.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the joint resolution (H. R. No. 11) authorizing G. Harris Heap, United States consul at Tunis, to accept the trust of commissioner of the Bey of Tunis, with an amendment by the Senate, in which the committee recommended concurrence.

The amendment of the Senate was read as follows:

At the end of the joint resolution insert the following:

Provided, That during his absence from his post he shall receive no compensation from the United States.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

GRADE AND PRIVILEGES OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. SWANN, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 823) to repeal section 16 of the act approved July 15, 1870, and to construe section 34 of the act approved July 28, 1866, relative to the grade and privileges of officers of the Army, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Territories to report back with amendments the bill (H. R. No. 1328) to amend the act entitled "An act to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government and for the admission of said State into the Union upon an equal footing with the original States," approved March 3, 1875.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a public bill.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SOUTHARD. Will it be in order to refer the bill?

Mr. RANDALL. It is not before the House.

The SPEAKER. It is a public bill, and therefore is not in order under this call.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I ask, then, the return of the bill.

GEORGE P. MARSH.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (S. No. 62) to authorize George P. Marsh to accept a certain present from the government of Switzerland and a certain present from the government of Italy.

The bill was read. It authorizes and empowers George P. Marsh, the minister of the United States to the kingdom of Italy, to accept a chronometer tendered him by the republic of Switzerland and a table tendered him by the kingdom of Italy in recognition of his services to said governments as arbitrator in a disagreement between the same touching a question of boundary.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FOG-SIGNAL AT SOUTH FARALLON.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 134) authorizing the construction of a steam fog signal at the South Farallon Island, California, accompanied by a favorable report in writing, and with the recommendation that the bill and report be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MARY W. JONES.

Mr. BLAND, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

MORRIS DWIGHT.

Mr. BAGBY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 682) granting a pension to Morris Dwight; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

LYDIA A. MORRIS.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1460) granting a pension to Lydia A. Morris, widow of John K. Morris, of Company A, Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN A. STEWART.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1809) granting a pension to John A. Stewart; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ELIZABETH R. HULL.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported a substitute (H. R. No. 1810) for the bill (H. R. No. 242) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Hull; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

JOHN CHANDLER.

Mr. BAGBY also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1732) to place on the muster-rolls the name of John Chandler, late of Company K, Thirty-sixth Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM T. SIMMS.

Mr. RUSK, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 362) granting a pension to William T. Simms; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FRANCIS BERNARD.

Mr. RUSK also, from the same committee, reported back, with the recommendation that it do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Francis Bernard; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

FANNIE E. RECORDS.

Mr. RAINEY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 1811) granting a pension to Fannie E. Records; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DAVID J. GARRETT.

Mr. SINNICKSON, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 111) granting a pension to David J. Garrett; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MRS. JANE DULANEY.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1118) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane Dulaney; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

MARY B. HOOK.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, also, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Mary B. Hook, widow of James H. Hook, lieutenant-colonel and assistant commissary-general of subsistence, and a bill for her relief, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, from the Committee on Roads and Canals, moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Charles Paine, superintendent of the Lake Shore and Michigan Southern Railroad Company, and other papers, asking the repeal or modification of an act to prevent cruelty to animals while in transit by railroads or other means of transportation in the United States, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

CLERK OF THE COMMITTEE ON ROADS AND CANALS.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Roads and Canals be authorized to employ a clerk, whose compensation shall be $4 per day.

Mr. HOLMAN. That resolution ought certainly to go to the Committe of Accounts, and I desire to make a motion that it be so referred.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I hope not, sir. I desire to state that the Committee on Railways and Canals have always had a clerk. The Committee of Accounts have decided that the same clerk shall be employed by the Pacific Railroad Committee and the Committee on Railways and Canals. Now, sir, the House has been in session for two months and I never have seen that clerk in our committee-room. I have inquired of him, and he has told me that his time is entirely occupied by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad and can give no time to us. Now, sir, our business is already considerable and is accumulating every day, and persons interested in the business connected with our committee go to our committee-room to ascertain the condition of the measures in which they are interested and there is no one there to give them any information on the subject. I therefore hope that the committee will be allowed to employ a clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact that the Committee on the Pacific Railroad has but a single bill pending before it, and the idea that it requires a clerk a single moment is entirely out of the question. I am sure that none of us desire that clerks of committees shall be employed to discharge the duties that properly devolve upon us. The practice has been in the past, when there was no great pressure or demand for economy, to refer all such matters to the Committee of Accounts. I know that my friend from Kentucky has the same motive that I have—the protection of the public interest; why, then, should he not let this subject go to the Committee of Accounts? Why treat the committee discourteously? They have already reported for the appointment of all clerks of committees heretofore appointed, except in one or two instances where resolutions were passed by the House. But the practice has been to refer all such questions to them, and I hope that it will be done in this case. Sir, we are increasing the number of clerks in the House beyond all past experience. We shall have to go before the country with instead of a reduction of expenditures an actual increase of expenditures for the House of Representatives.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to say that my information in regard to the business before the Pacific Railroad Committee is entirely different from that of the gentleman from Indiana. I understand that that committee has been in session for many days past. The information I derived in regard to the business before it was from the clerk of the committee.

Now, sir, I am as much in favor of cutting down expenses as the gentleman from Indiana can be, but I do contend that the business of the country should be done, and done to the satisfaction of everybody. I would like the gentleman to state to the House if he has ever known a time since the formation of the Committee on Railways and Canals when it has not had a clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am not able to say whether it has or has not. Without professing to have precise information in regard to the amount of business before the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, I have, in common with other members of the House, a general idea of the amount of business before the various committees of the House. I think we are now appointing a larger number of clerks than the public business requires, and, in order that there may be inquiry into the matter, let this resolution go to the Committee of Accounts, and, if they think a clerk is necessary, there will be no objection; but until the committee report in favor of it I do not think we ought to pass it.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I have as much respect for the Committee of Accounts as anybody, but they have been appealed to and re-appealed to on the subject, and have ignored our appeal.

The Committee on Railways and Canals has always had a room to itself heretofore, but now their room is given a part of the time to another committee. We are already encumbered in that room with a great deal of business, and I know what business is before that committee much better than does the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I will say this to the House, if they will give our committee a clerk and the time should arrive when we can dispense with his services, then, in furtherance of the idea of the gentleman from Indiana and of the economy of the House and of the democratic party, I will see that the clerk is discharged. But I insist that the resolution shall now be considered by the House.

Mr. FORT. With all deference to my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. JONES,] allow me to say that I hope this resolution will be referred to the Committee of Accounts, if that committee is to investigate the subject of awarding clerks to the several committees of the House. Let me say now to the House that the Committee of Accounts is considering the application of the gentleman from Kentucky, and I believe it has a report ready.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Is the gentleman on that committee?

Mr. FORT. I am.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Well, rather than consume any further time of the House in the discussion of this resolution, I will consent to its reference.

Mr. FORT. I believe I have the floor, and will conclude what I have to say. The Committee of Accounts have considered the application of the gentleman from Kentucky with applications of similar character by other gentlemen. We are desirous of giving them all the assistance in their labors which we can. But let me say to the House that the roll of clerks already exceeds in number that allowed to the last House, and the committee are unwilling to further swell that roll without a full investigation and a fair understanding of all the circumstances in each case.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Was not a clerk given to the Committee on Railways and Canals of the last House?

Mr. FORT. I think they had a clerk a part of the time. But, as has been well said by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] one committee which has been assigned a clerk in conjunction with the committee of which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] is chairman has but one bill before it. Now, it can hardly be possible that the care and custody of one single bill can occupy all the time of a clerk for so long; at least the Committee of Accounts think so. I do not see the chairman of the Committee of Accounts [Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana,] in the House at this time. I believe that he desires and is willing to accommodate the gentleman if he can possibly do so and at the same time have a due regard to economy.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will make no objection to the reference of this resolution to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the resolution is referred I desire to submit an amendment to it, so that the amendment may also be referred to the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. FORT. You might as well have them all referred together.

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is germane to the subject of the resolution.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts assign to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures a clerk at a salary of $4 per day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL.) The Chair rules that amendment not in order. The pending resolution comes from a committee, and relates to a particular matter to which this amendment is not germane.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I do not accept the amendment.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire, when the opportunity presents itself, to offer my resolution and have it referred to the Committee of Accounts.

The motion to refer the resolution of Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, to the Committee of Accounts was agreed to.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I now offer the resolution which was read a moment ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is it a report from a committee?

Mr. O'BRIEN. It is not a report from a committee, but I offer it as representing a committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not now in order.

CHARLES H. FONDÉ.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY, from the Committee on Patents, reported back, with a recommendation that the same do pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1440) to enable Charles H. Fondé to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for improvement in dredging-machines.

Mr. BURCHARD. Ought not this bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

Mr. CONGER. Why?

Mr. BURCHARD. I have not examined the bill, but judging from its title I think it proposes to give some special rights to an individual.

Mr. CONGER. I thought the gentleman did not understand it very well. I cannot see any point on which it should go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BURCHARD. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It provides that the petition of Charles H. Fondé, of Mobile, Alabama, for extension of letters-patent for an improvement in dredging-machines, granted April 17, 1855, numbered 12720, and extended by the Commissioner of Patents for seven years from April 17, 1869, which term will expire on April 17, 1876, shall be referred to the Commissioner of Patents, with full power and authority to hear and determine the same; and if, after hearing the said petition, upon due notice to the public according to the practice of the Patent Office in cases of extension, the said Commissioner should decide that said petition ought to be granted, he is hereby authorized and empowered to extend said letters-patent for seven years from April 17, 1876, to said Charles H. Fondé.

Mr. BURCHARD. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not this bill subject to a point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. HOLMAN. If it is I would like to make it.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask that the report be read.

The report states that Charles H. Fondé has made every effort in his power to perfect and put in use the dredging-machine for which he seeks an extension of patent, has expended large sums of money, but from adverse circumstances, which he could in no way control, has suffered great loss; with others he has lost three machines, one by explosion of boilers and two by other accidents, rendering them nearly a total loss; that the committee find the machine of which he is the inventor is not of such a character that the general interests of the public would be damaged or interfered with should the application be granted, and therefore they recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. REAGAN. Without having investigated this case or knowing anything about the facts beyond their presentation in the report, which seems to be made on the statement of the patentee alone, I understand that this patent has already had a renewal for seven years. The policy of giving patents for inventions which may be beneficial to the public is all well enough, and in proper cases a single extension may not be objectionable; but beyond that I think extensions of patents are generally designed simply to secure monopolies to individuals against the interest of the public. For my own part I know of no case in which a patent so extended has not been improperly extended, to the injury of the public and simply to make the invention a monopoly. Upon general principles I am inclined to vote against all such propositions.

I understand of course that this bill proposes merely to refer the question of the extension to the Commissioner of Patents; but I do not think it good policy to revive patents, certainly not after they have been extended for one term of seven years. I trust therefore that this bill may not be passed.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. The Committee on Patents have carefully examined this application and think it meritorious. No opposition is offered to it. On the contrary, petitions have been presented from a number of parties recommending the passage of the bill. It is clearly established that Mr. Fondé has received no compensation for his invention, but has been a heavy loser. This bill proposes merely to allow him to go before the Commissioner of Patents and present his application for a renewal.

This is an entirely different case from the extension of a sewing-machine patent or anything of that kind going into domestic use. This is a vast machine, the construction of a single one costing something like $50,000. We have the patentee's statements and affidavits, together with the history of the three or four machines which are the only ones thus far constructed. The committee are averse to renewing any patent unless the case shows real merit. They deem this such a case, and have felt it their duty to report it favorably.

Mr. CONGER. Perhaps it is due to the Committee on Patents that I should explain somewhat the views of the committee in regard to extension of patents in general, and also their opinion in reference to this particular application.

From the views which the committee have expressed and the resolutions which they have adopted for the government of their action, I think that no gentleman of this House, however much he may be opposed to the extension of patents or to granting monopolies to companies or individuals, will have any occasion to find fault with any recommendation of the committee.

Old members of the House will recollect my opposition heretofore to the extension of any patent where the inventor had already received sufficient remuneration, either from the public or anybody else. I think that this rule will control the action of the committee in a manner to satisfy probably the most strict objector.

This patent is for a rotary dredging-machine, unlike, perhaps, any one in use in the country. It is very complicated, more complicated even than a steamboat. It requires very expensive machinery, making the cost of each machine perhaps fifty or sixty thousand dollars. It happens that only four of these machines have been constructed during the twenty-one years of the life of this patent. Three of those were destroyed or very materially injured immediately upon their application to work. The inventor has never received one cent from the public. The public has never paid one cent for this patent in any shape whatever. It is a machine that cannot come into general use. It is designed for the larger kind of dredging in rivers and harbors. So far as we can judge, it may prove to be a very valuable invention.

The fourth one of these machines has been completed and is now being put to work in the harbor of Baltimore to test its capacity. If it proves successful it will undoubtedly reduce very greatly the expense of clearing our harbors and rivers, where a great amount of dredging is required. Unquestionably, if successful, as the inventor hopes, it will cheapen that kind of work as well for the Government as for the public.

With all my objections to extensions in general, and after having carefully examined this application both in the last Congress and in the present, I see no reason on any principle whatever why the privilege now asked by this inventor should not be granted. He has struggled for almost twenty-one years to perfect this invention; has incurred the outlay not only of the fortune he had at the time he commenced his operations, but all the earnings of a life. Hence I have cheerfully joined with the other members of the committee in recommending that this patentee be allowed to apply to the Commissioner of Patents for a further extension.

Mr. REAGAN. In view of the statement which the gentleman from Michigan has just made, would it not be charitable to this inventor to let the patent expire?

Mr. CONGER. That may be so; but the committee do not feel that they are instituted as the particular guardian or supervisor of charities. Patents do not generally come under that head. I think that this is such a case that probably every member of the House, upon giving it individual examination, would approve the recommendation of the committee and favor the passage of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, if this invention is of such a character that the continuance of the patent will cheapen the dredging of harbors and aid the General Government, then it certainly may accomplish the same object if the patent be not extended. My objection to this measure is that it is an entering-wedge by which private individuals may be encouraged to hang about the halls of legislation to promote their ends after they have had the benefit of twenty-one years of favor from the General Government. I believe that a term of twenty-one years is long enough for any invention. I am opposed to this and all other extensions.

Mr. CONGER. One word to my friend from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] for I have found him to be a reasonable man, and I think a word will be sufficient. The only machine of this kind that has ever perhaps been made ready for work is now prepared. It is even uncertain whether this one will not require great additional expenditure before it is perfected. It is now on trial. In April next the term of the patent will run out.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The inventor can now patent the improvements he proposes to make.

Mr. CONGER. There are no improvements to be made. What is to be done is to perfect a very cumbersome piece of machinery and make it practicable in its workings.

Mr. J. H. BAGLEY. I will say to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York] that the evidence in this case shows that this man and others with him have expended about $200,000 to perfect these machines. They have received but $25,000, a result which was caused by the loss of these three machines. Therefore there will not be adequate compensation for his invention unless this bill be passed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 40, noes 71.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. RANDALL in the chair.) The bill is rejected unless a further count be demanded.

Mr. BRIGHT. Has not the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I demand the regular order of business, as this is objection-day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I desire to have tellers on the passage of the pending bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until next Friday.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to make a point of order, that nothing can interfere to prevent action on the bill when the House is dividing.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair did not recognize the gentleman from Alabama who demanded tellers before he recognized the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] who called attention to the fact that the morning hour had expired, and to the further fact that this was objection day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. There is no injury done to this bill, as it goes over and comes up next Friday in the morning hour.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I do not object to that.

Mr. HOAR. When the House is dividing on the passage of a bill and tellers are called for, in my judgment that cannot be interfered with by any other business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CALDWELL] did not promptly ask or the Chair did not hear him—for tellers. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] immediately in front having raised the point of order that the morning hour had expired, the Chair had but one thing to do, and that was to decide that the morning hour had expired. The bill goes over to the morning hour next Friday, and the first question will be on ordering tellers on the passage of the bill.

OBJECTION DAY—PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. HOLMAN in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN. This is objection day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and the bill and report in each case will be read, and if objection be made the bill will be laid aside, but if there be no objection the bill will be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ALEXANDER ST. BERNARD.

The first bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. MORRISON. This is a proposition to pension a man who was not in the military or naval service of the United States, and therefore I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection being made, the bill will be laid aside.

ROBERT ERWIN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Court of Claims may take jurisdiction of the claims of Robert Erwin, of Savannah, Georgia, for property taken from him, which claims were by accident or mistake of his agent not filed in season to save the term of limitation, without fault or neglect on said Erwin's part.

From the report it appears that the memorialist, at the time of the capture of the city of Savannah by the military forces of the United States, in December, 1864, claimed to be the owner of two certain lots of cotton, one of which was in his possession in the city of Savannah and stored in his warehouse, and the other lot was stored in Thomasville, Georgia; that both of these lots of cotton are alleged by memorialist to have been seized by the officers and agents of the United States, and subsequently shipped by said agents to the city of New York, and there sold by such agents, and the proceeds of the sale thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States, allegations sustained by the proof adduced; that the memorialist, for the purpose of making claim against the United States for the proceeds of the said lots of cotton in the Court of Claims, under the provisions of the act of March 12, 1863, entitled "The abandoned or captured property act," employed Joseph B. Stewart, an attorney and counselor at law in the city of Washington, as his attorney, for the purpose of instituting a suit in the Court of Claims as provided by the above-named act, and for that purpose the memorialist placed in the hands of his said attorney all the papers relating to said claims; that there is no doubt that the memorialist was led to believe by the repeated statements or representations of the said Stewart that suits in the name of the memorialist for the proceeds of the said lots of cotton had been instituted in the said Court of Claims within the time limited by law; that the said Stewart neglected or failed to have the suits for the said lots of cotton instituted in the Court of Claims as he had represented to the memorialist had been done, and that the memorialist was not informed that the suits were not instituted until the time limited by law for commencing them had expired, and then the memorialist employed another attorney, who brought the said suits in the Court of Claims, but under the decision of the Supreme Court not within the time limited by law; that the memorialist was not guilty of any negligence or default, but made all proper efforts to secure his right to the proceeds of the said lots of cotton in the only way which the law provided for him, and that the injury and loss sustained by him are the result of the negligence or default of his said attorney.

This bill received the unanimous report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the last Congress, and was passed by the House without opposition.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES M. COFFINBERRY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry.

The preamble recites that it appears that James M. Coffinberry, of the city of Cleveland, and State of Ohio, was lately a judge of the court of common pleas within and for the fourth judicial district of the State of Ohio, and it is represented that as such judge he was assessed and paid income taxes on his salary for the period of five years under the internal-revenue laws of the United States as then construed and executed; and that, by reason of the serious ill health of said James M. Coffinberry and his absence from home considerable periods of time consequent thereon since said assessments and payments, he was not informed that such assessments and payments had been held by the proper authorities to be illegal and that the same would be refunded by the Treasury Department in time to prepare and present his claim therefor within the period required by section 44 of the act approved June 6, 1872, as by that act said claims should have been presented by June 6, 1873, but were not, as is alleged, presented until the following month of November.

The bill then authorizes and directs the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to examine said claims of said James M. Coffinberry, when presented for that purpose in the manner heretofore prescribed by the Treasury Department for the presentation of the like claims, and to reject said claims or to refund said taxes the same as if said claims had been presented within the period fixed by section 44 of the act approved June 6, 1872, aforesaid.

From the report it appears that James M. Coffinberry, while a judge of the court of common pleas within and for the fourth judicial district of the State of Ohio, had assessed against him, and paid, under the internal-revenue laws of the United States, for five successive years, the income tax upon his salary as said judge; and that by reason of continued sickness and absence from home, in consequence thereof he did not learn that such assessments and payments had been adjudged illegal, and that the same would be refunded by the Government, in time to prepare and present his claim therefor within the period required by the forty-fourth section of the act of Congress approved June 6, A. D. 1872.

Your committee therefore consider the claim of the said James M. Coffinberry just and equitable, and recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. That bill ought to pass, but I think the preamble is unnecessary; still, not wishing to prevent the bill being reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass, I will leave that amendment to be made in the House.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HATTIE D. M'KEAN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKean.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Hattie D. McKean, widow of William A. McKean, late a coal-passer in the naval service on board the United States steamer Nyack.

From the report it appears that William A. McKean entered the naval service of the United States August 30, 1864; that he was then a sound, healthy man; that he was first put on the sick-list February 19, 1865, and died, of cancer of the stomach, at Wilmington, North Carolina, March 26, 1865, while in said service and in the line of duty. The time, place, and cause of death are sworn to by Acting Assistant Surgeon B. F. Bigelow, in charge at the time. Deceased left a widow, the petitioner, and one legitimate child, Nettie Blanche McKean, born August 21, 1864. The committee are clearly of the opinion that she is legally entitled to a pension.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

RUTH ISABELLE NAYLOR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1348) granting a pension to Ruth Isabelle Naylor.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to make a remark on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is not open to debate. By the rules debate is taken as an objection to the bill, this being objection day.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Then I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is laid aside.

PATRICK GLACKIN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 31) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place upon the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Patrick Glackin, late a private of Company G, Seventh Regiment Ohio Cavalry, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of the act.

From the report it appears that Patrick Glackin, late a private in Company G, Seventh Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, asks for pension because of injuries received while in the military service of the United States and in the line of duty. The committee, after a careful examination of the evidence, find that Patrick Glackin was enrolled in Company G, Seventh Regiment Ohio Cavalry Volunteers, September 21, 1862; that while on duty with his company, at Lexington, Kentucky, his horse fell with him, and so injured the petitioner that he was disabled from further active duty, and was detailed as footorderly at headquarters; that the injuries received as above resulted in inguinal hernia of the right side; and that he was honorably discharged June 22, 1865.

The medical evidence shows that he was a sound man when he entered the service; that he was treated for the injury as early as June, 1866; and that the disability amounts to one-half. The committee are satisfied that the evidence is sufficient to make a proper case for the petitioner, and would therefore report favorably and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill for his relief.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HENRY SCHNETBERG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 216) granting a pension to Henry Schnetberg, of Indiana.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. DOUGLAS objected.

JOHN G. PARR.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 215) granting a pension to John G. Parr, of Kittanning, Pennsylvania.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of John G. Parr, late a lieutenant-colonel of the One hundred and thirty-ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and pay him a pension as of the rank of lieutenant-colonel, instead of that of captain, from the 1st day of June, 1865, deducting the pension already paid.

From the report it appears that John G. Parr entered the military service of the United States at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, on the 22d day of August, 1862, as captain of Company C, of the One hundred and thirty-ninth Regiment of Pennsylvania Infantry Volunteers, and was honorably discharged as the lieutenant-colonel of said regiment on the 21st day of June, 1865.

At the battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia, on the 3d of June, 1864, while commanding his company, he received a gunshot wound from the enemy's artillery, which severed his right hand and arm below the elbow. Again in battle near Petersburgh, Virginia, on the 25th day of March, 1865, while commanding the said regiment as lieutenant-colonel, he received a severe contusion or shell wound in the right hip.

He was commissioned a captain on the 22d of August, 1862. On the 28th of June, 1864, he was commissioned a major of said regiment, to rank as such from the 6th of June, 1864. On the 18th day of July, 1864, he was commissioned lieutenant-colonel of said regiment, to rank as such from the 6th day of June, 1864, and was mustered in as lieutenant-colonel on the 6th of July, 1864. On the 25th day of August, 1864, as soon as he had sufficiently recovered from his said wounds and amputation to enable him to do so, and before his wounds had fully healed, he returned to his regiment and performed the duties of lieutenant-colonel, and was, while so acting and in line of duty, in battle before Petesburgh, in Virginia, again wounded as aforesaid by being struck by a piece of shell in the hip. On the 20th day of April, 1865, the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, did confer on said soldier the rank of colonel by brevet, to rank as such from the 1st day of August, 1864, for meritorious services at the battle of Cold Harbor, Virginia, when and where he received his severe wound.

That by reason of the wounds and injuries sustained he was granted a pension to date from 21st of June, 1865, the time of his discharge, and placed on the pension-roll as of the rank of captain, and was paid a pension accordingly of $20 per month.

The petitioner prays that by special act he may be placed on the pension-roll as a lieutenant-colonel, and that he be paid a pension as of that rank from the said 21st of June, 1865, all pension received to be deducted.

It is proved that ever since the amputation of the soldier's right hand and arm as aforesaid he has suffered unusual pain, inconvenience, and annoyance by reason of continued, violent, and involuntary jerking and spasmodic twitching of the stump of the arm and of the whole arm remaining to him, the motions and violent vibrations of which can only be overcome and restrained by the application of external physical force; that he submitted to a second amputation, and the expense and suffering consequent, without benefit or relief. Whether this extraordinary condition arises from the unskillfulness of the amputation, or from a peculiar nervous condition produced in him by the wound, are questions which seem to baffle the many surgeons who have been consulted. At the Pension Bureau, the pension to the soldier was allowed and fixed at the rate allowed by law for the rank the soldier held at the time he received the principal wound, and not for the rank he held when he received the second wound and when discharged, although admitting that there was very great merit in the case, and that it was one on which relief should come from Congress.

The peculiar characteristics of the disability of the soldier seem to increase with the lapse of time, and now amount to total disability, as is shown by the opinions of the surgeons who have examined the case. Dr. Otto states that the soldier is wholly disabled and incapacitated for labor of any kind, and that the disability is permanent. In this other surgeons agree, and all join in pronouncing this a peculiar and most extraordinary case. The committee report back the bill (H. R. No. 215) with an amendment, and recommend its passage.

The CHAIRMAN. This bill is reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions with an amendment, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out these words: "instead of that of captain, from the 1st day of June, 1865, deducting the pension already paid."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass as amended.

G. W. LA POINTE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 995) granting a pension to G. W. La Pointe.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of G. W. La Pointe, late lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh Michigan Volunteers, on the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report was read, as follows:

That the petitioner was in receipt of a pension as late first lieutenant by reason of disabilities, resulting from gunshot wound; that said La Pointe applied for lieutenant-colonel's pension, and a re-examination of his case revealed some unexplained discrepancies, causing the Commissioner to drop La Pointe's name from the pension-rolls.

In the opinion of the committee, the necessary proof from the first surgeon of La Pointe's command, the Seventh Michigan Veteran Volunteer Infantry, has been produced, covering the matter in dispute, which was as to the possibility of necrosis being in abeyance for a long period, and making its appearance subsequent to discharge.

The injury and service were proven, and the question involved in the re-examination is, in your committee's opinion, settled.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

ELIZABETH A. NEIBLING.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Elizabeth A. Neibling, widow of James M. Neibling, late colonel of the Twenty-first Regiment Ohio Volunteers, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

That said James M. Neibling entered the military service in the early part of the late war; that he was a faithful and brave soldier, always at his post; that he was wounded in the right arm, which necessitated amputation just below the elbow; that the wound was received on the field at Dallas, Georgia, in May, 1864; that he was honorably discharged from the service on his voluntary resignation in December, 1864; that before he was wounded he was in good health, and capable of, and did perform, the most arduous duties of a soldier, but after he was wounded his health gradually and persistently declined until the 21st day of February, 1869, when he died; that Elizabeth Neibling, the petitioner, is his widow, and resides at Findlay, Ohio; and that the said Elizabeth made application for pension as the widow of Colonel Neibling, which, after several years' delay, was rejected on the alleged ground that Colonel Neibling died of a disease contracted prior to his entering the service.

The foregoing facts are well established, and the committee are satisfied that the wound received by Colonel Neibling and the consequent amputation of his arm were the primary causes of his death, and that his widow is entitled to a pension. The country should take care of the widows and orphans of its brave soldiers. They are the wards of the nation. The committee report favorably on said bill, and recommend its passage.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

EZRA B. BARNETT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 193) for the relief of Ezra B. Barnett, with an amendment.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, in the State of New York, in his account as such postmaster, with the sum of $95, surplus money-order funds, mailed by said postmaster September 29, 1874, for deposit with the postmaster at Binghamton, New York, said money having been burned and destroyed with the mail-car containing it on the route to Binghamton, without the fault of said postmaster.

The amendment reported by the Committee of Claims was as follows:

Strike out these words:

That the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, in the State of New York, in his account as such postmaster with the sum of $95.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to place the sum of $95 to the credit of the Postmaster-General, with the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, on money-order account; whereupon the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department shall credit Ezra B. Barnett, postmaster at Norwich, New York, with said amount in his account as said postmaster, it being the amount of——

The report was read, as follows:

It is shown by the affidavits of the said Ezra B. Barnett and Carroll C. Brooks, that the said postmaster did, on the 29th day of September, 1874, inclose and mail to the postmaster at Binghamton, New York, $95 surplus money-order funds, as was his duty under the regulations and instructions of the Post-Office Department to do, and that the mail-car in which the said funds were being transported was burned and entirely consumed, with its contents, en route to Binghamton. The evidence submitted is satisfactory to the Post-Office Department as to the loss of the funds without the fault of said postmaster, and the superintendent of the money-order department says, in a letter of date October 21, 1874, that it is satisfactory, and that the said postmaster is permitted to carry on his weekly statements, as funds on hand, $95, in addition to any reserve that may be allowed his office.

Your committee further find that the money so destroyed was derived from the patrons of the money-order system, in the purchase of orders, and was being transmitted to another office, to be there paid out in orders drawn upon it. To authorize the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department to credit the postmaster with the $95 would be, therefore, to make the Post-Office Department sustain the loss of that sum, while the Treasury Department, by reason of the destruction of the United States Treasury and national-bank notes, comprising the amount, would gain that amount.

Therefore, your committee, while finding that the claimant is entitled to relief, as a matter of equity between the Post-Office and Treasury Departments report the bill back to the House, with the accompanying amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

No objection was made, and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

DE WITT C. SENTER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1591) to pay De Witt C. Senter, of Tennessee, mileage and per diem for appearing under summons as witness before a committee of the Forty-first Congress.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. HOAR. I object.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. What is the ground of the gentleman's objection?

The CHAIRMAN. The objection is absolute, and is not open to debate. The Chair will ask the Clerk to read the one hundredth rule of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the first and fourth Friday of each month the calendar of private bills shall be called over, (the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House commencing the call where he left off the previous day,) and the bills to the passage of which no objection shall then be made shall be first considered and disposed of. But when a bill is again reached, after having been once objected to, the committee shall consider and dispose of the same, unless it shall again be objected to by at least five members.

HORACE GLOVER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1592) to re-imburse Horace Glover for property unlawfully seized and sold by the United States Government.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, objected.

LAND CLAIMS IN THE STATE OF MISSOURI.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri.

The bill was read.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object to the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. BUCKNER. The report has not yet been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that where a report is made by a committee to accompany a bill the reading of the report may be called for prior to the inquiry of the Chair for objections.

Mr. BUCKNER. If the objection is to be made after the report is read, I do not care to insist on the reading of it.

Mr. DUNNELL. I object, and do not ask for the reading of the report.

FIRST LIEUTENANT HENRY JACKSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 29) for the relief of First Lieutenant Henry Jackson, Seventh Cavalry, United States Army.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, objected.

JAMES A. HILE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to issue to James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri, late soldier of Company F, Twenty-first Regiment of Missouri Infantry Volunteers, an honorable discharge from the service, and to so amend the records and muster-rolls of the War Department as to show that he is no deserter; the said James A. Hile to be entitled to all pay and bounty as other soldiers of his rank and arm of service, deducting the time of his absence.

The report was read, as follows:

That the claimant enlisted in the Twenty-first Regiment of Missouri Volunteers, on the 15th day of July, 1861, for the term of three years; that at the expiration of his term of service he received an honorable discharge; that at the town of Canton, in the State of Mississippi, he veteranized or re-enlisted for three years, or during the war; that while detailed as one of the permanent guard over the military prison at Mobile, he was taken sick with a fever, from the effects of which he lost the use of his right eye, and the sight of the left one was very much impaired. Learning of the death of his mother, and the injuries his father received from the running away of a team, and from which he was not likely to recover, the claimant asked to be permitted to go home, being unable to perform duty, to see his father, and have his eye properly treated; and, though asked for several times, a furlough for a few weeks would not be granted to him. Being of no use to the Army, and the time for which he had enlisted having expired, and fearing total blindness, he informed the orderly sergeant of his company of his intention of leaving his regiment for the treatment of his eye, and of his intention of returning to his command when so treated; that a few weeks after he arrived at home his regiment was mustered out of service, and the men returned to their homes; that he left his command for the reasons above stated, and for no other; that previous to the illness in which he lost his eye he had never been sick, but always ready for duty; that he is now blind; that he was a brave soldier and fought gallantly on many of the most bitterly contested battle-fields of the war, as is abundantly certified by officers of his regiment; that the proper certificates of his field officers cannot be had, owing to the death of his colonel and major, and the only one who remains and could give any information has removed to a place unknown to the claimant. Our conclusion is, that he should have the relief as asked for by said bill, and therefore recommend its passage.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee informally rose; and Mr. WOODWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate was communicated by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 52) directing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay the interest on the bonds issued in pursuance of the act of Congress approved June 20, 1874, out of any funds in the United States Treasury subject to the requisition of said commissioners, and for other purposes.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

JOHN T. BURCHELL.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Paymaster-General of the Army of the United States, out of any money in his hands for the payment of the Army, to pay to John T. Burchell the sum of $135, the balance due him for services rendered at the small-pox hospital at Knoxville, Tennessee, from December 10, 1863, to January 12, 1864.

The report was read, as follows:

It appears from the testimony in this case that claimant was, on or about the 10th day of December, 1863, in the employ of the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army, at Knoxville, Tennessee, and, at the request of Dr. E. Goetz, United States Army, he abandoned his employment to take charge of a small-pox hospital, and rendered service therein for one month and two days. Claimant alleges that Dr. Jackson, medical director Twenty-third Army Corps, agreed to pay him at the rate of $150 per month; and it appears that the only compensation he received for the service was $25, paid him by Quartermaster Captain Lunt.

The committee are of the opinion that the amount of $150 per month was not an unreasonable compensation for the character of the services rendered, and therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend that it pass.

No objection was made; and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

RUTH ELLEN GREELAUD.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greelaud.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Ruth Ellen Greelaud, widow of John H. Greelaud, late a captain in the Army of the United States.

The report was read, as follows:

That the petitioner was married to the late Captain John H. Greelaud, November 30, 1850. From June 23, 1843, when he graduated as a military cadet, until the date of his death, on the 17th day of August, 1857, Captain Greelaud continued without intermission in the military service of his country. His death was occasioned by an attack of remittent fever, of a congestive form, which was contracted while at his post at Fort Dulaney, Florida. No medical attendance was had for eight days, when his case was reported and he was removed to Fort Myers, and died on the twelfth day of the attack. Stationed at a fort among the swamps of Florida, without medical attendance, Captain Greelaud died of disease contracted in the service in the line of his duty, and it is the debt of his country to provide for his widow, whom he has thus left destitute. Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

No objection was made; and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM D. COBAUGH.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 933) granting a pension to William D. Cobaugh.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William D. Cobaugh, late a private of Company H, Third Pennsylvania Cavalry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That William D. Cobaugh was a private in Company A, in the Third Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry, in the war of 1861-'65; that, while in service in the line of his duty, he lost his left leg, which was amputated about four inches below the knee, and now receives therefor a pension, on certificate No. 31895, at the rate of $18 per month. The pensioner was personally before your committee, and, from a careful inquiry and examination, your committee find the pensioner's limb, from the length of the stump and character of the amputation, as fully disqualifies and disables him as though his limb had been amputated at above the knee. They would therefore report in favor of the following bill, as a substitute for said bill, so as to allow the pensioner a pension, from the passage of this act, of $24 per month, in lieu of $18 per month, and recommend its passage.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

WILLIAM R. DUNCAN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1598) granting a pension to William R. Duncan.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of William R. Duncan, late a private in Company G, Third Regiment of Tennessee Infantry Volunteers, and pay him a pension from the 23d day of July, A. D. 1873, the date at which he was dropped from the pension-roll.

The report was read, as follows:

That William R. Duncan, the petitioner, together with his father and brothers, at the breaking out of the war, resided at the base of the Cumberland Mountain, on the principal pass across the mountains, and the one most frequented by Union people escaping from within the rebel military lines. William R. Duncan and his brothers engaged in guiding, and did guide, many hundreds of Union refugees across the mountains, and within the lines of the Union forces in Kentucky. For this they were betrayed by their rebel neighbors and captured by rebel troops from Knoxville. While on their way to prison at Knoxville, William R. Duncan and one brother escaped, while the other brother, Isaac W. Duncan, being a cripple, was unable to make his escape, and was imprisoned at Knoxville. William R. Duncan, at the advice of his father and neighbors, for the purpose of securing his brother's release from prison, went to Knoxville, and upon the condition of his brother's being released from prison and allowed to return home, did voluntarily enlist in the rebel service, without any intention of aiding or abetting the rebellion, but solely for the purpose of securing his brother's release, and with the intention of deserting as soon as his brother was safely out of their power. William R. Duncan enlisted in the rebel service in a company composed of Union prisoners taken from the prisons in Knoxville, under Captain Cain, on the 10th day of December, 1861, and made his escape from them on the 20th of December, and returned to the neighborhood of his home, where he was compelled to hide himself in the woods, where, after he had collected together a company of Union men, he crossed the mountains into Kentucky, and on the 10th day of February, 1862, enlisted in the Third Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, from which he was discharged on the 13th day of February, 1865, by reason of "expiration of term of service." The petitioner was pensioned, commencing February 14, 1865, at the rate of $2, which was increased to $4, per month, December 14, 1872, and was dropped from the pension-roll July 23, 1873, on account of his own admission of voluntary enlistment in the rebel army. (See copy of order and letter of Commissioner attached.) The petitioner furnishes the most direct and positive testimony of his loyalty both before and during the war, as shown by the affidavits of the following persons:

Major-General Joseph Cooper says that he has known the petitioner for more than twelve years, and that of his own knowledge he knows him to have been a Union man first, last, and all the time, and that he never did aid or abet in the rebellion. Colonel Daughty, Lieutenant Black, Lieutenant Gamble, Third Tennessee Infantry, commanding the company in which petitioner served, Lieutenant M. D. Wallace and Lieutenant Henry P. Farmer, of Ninth Tennessee Cavalry, all concur in stating that they have known the petitioner, William R. Duncan, both before and during the war; that he was always a Union man, and that of their own knowledge they swear that he never did in any way aid or abet in the rebellion; this testimony in the strongest possible manner corroborating the petitioner's statement and the facts as shown in this report. The committee believe that, while the action of the Commissioner in dropping the petitioner from the pension-roll was in accordance with the strict letter of the law, it was not in accordance with the spirit or intention thereof, and that a more liberal construction in this case would have more nearly accomplished the ends which the pension laws are designed to effect. The committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 23, 1873.

Drop from the pension list, roll of the Knoxville (Tennessee) agency, the name of William R. Duncan, certificate No. 122306, on his own admission of voluntary enlistment in the rebel army.

———,
Commissioner.

Finance Division.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., December 23, 1873.

SIR: In the matter of your suspended pension, No. 122306, you are informed that section 23 of the act of March 3, 1873, provides that no person shall be entitled to the benefits of a pension who in any manner engaged in the rebellion; and you are further informed that inasmuch as it appears from your own admission that your enlistment was your own voluntary act, though prompted by the generous motive of obtaining the release from prison of a crippled brother, and with the intention on your part to desert from that service at your earliest opportunity, this Office cannot, in the administration of the law, do otherwise than drop your name from the pension list in accordance with the provisions of the act herein referred to. The Office, however, in consideration of your subsequent long service in the Union Army, and also the faithfulness and devotion of your family, as well as yourself, to the cause of the Government, as set forth in your several letters, takes the liberty of suggesting that relief, in the matter of a pension, might be had by application for special legislation of Congress.

Very respectfully,

———,
Commissioner.

Mr. W. R. DUNCAN,
Wallace's Cross Roads, Anderson County, Tennessee.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

FRANCES C. ELLIOTT.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1599) granting a pension to Frances C. Elliott.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Frances C. Elliott, widow of Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, late of the United States Navy, and pay her a pension of $50 per month from and after the passage of this act; and this pension to be in lieu of that which she is now receiving.

The report was read, as follows:

That the petitioner is the widow of the late Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, of the United States Navy, and was granted a pension, under the provisions of the act of August 11, 1848, of $50 per month, commencing on the 10th of December, 1850, and to "continue during widowhood." By section 13 of the act of July 27, 1868, construing section 3 of the act of July 23, 1866, her pension was reduced to $30, at which rate she has been paid since the 4th day of September, 1869. Mrs. Elliott is now eighty-three years old, blind, and in feeble health, and entirely dependent on her pension for support and maintenance. Her husband, Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, was a distinguished and meritorious officer in our Navy, who bore a gallant and conspicuous part in the battle on Lake Erie, and afterward, and up to the time of his death was much employed and trusted by his superiors. He died leaving his family in straitened circumstances, which have resulted in leaving his widow in her old age and decrepitude destitute. In consideration of these facts, which disclose a meritorious case, and of the further fact that in all probability Mrs. Elliott will not live long to enjoy the bounty of the Government, the committee report the bill herewith submitted as a substitute for the bill H. R. No. 414, and recommend its passage.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

MARGARET E. WEST.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1044) granting a pension to Margaret E. West.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret E. West, widow of Robert M. West, late colonel of the Fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Cavalry, and pay her a pension, for herself and her two children under sixteen years of age, from and after the passage of the act, at the rate of pensions for widows of deceased captains in the Army.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions recommended the adoption of an amendment to strike out the word "captains," and insert in lieu thereof the word "colonels."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELIZABETH B. DYER.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 80) granting a pension to Elizabeth B. Dyer, widow of Alexander B. Dyer, late a brigadier-general and Chief of Ordnance, United States Army.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, objected.

JANE A. HARRIS.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1600) granting a pension to Jane A. Harris.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Jane A. Harris, dependent mother of Edgar T. Harris, late a private in Company A, First West Virginia Infantry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That the petitioner is the mother of Edgar T. Harris, a private in Company A, First West Virginia Volunteers, in the United States service; that said Edgar entered the said service September 25, 1861, and was discharged therefrom November 26, 1864; that he was taken prisoner by the enemy at the battle of Port Republic, June 9, 1862, and afterward paroled, and again entered the service for duty; that on March 15, 1864, while in the recruiting service, near Petersburgh, he was wounded by the accidental discharge of a pistol, the ball entering his back, and, ranging downward, producing paralysis of the bowels and diseased condition of the kidneys, from the effects of which he died in the Government hospital, at Hampton, Virginia, on November 6, 1873. On April 28, 1865, he filed his application for pension, under the statute in such case made and provided, but the application was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions June 30, 1865. Congress, however, by special act, approved July 13, 1866, granted to him a pension at the rate of $15 per month, which was paid to him up to the time of his death, to wit, November 6, 1873.

The petitioner, on —— day of December, 1873, filed her application and petition for a pension, in consequence of the death of the said Edgar T., her only son, upon whom she was dependent for support, her husband having died before the said Edgar had entered the Army, and during his infancy. Her petition is fully sustained by proof, but her claim was also rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions, January 29, 1875, for the reason, as it is alleged, that the wound was produced "by the accidental discharge of a belt-pistol" while the said Harris "was engaged in wrestling." The evidence upon this point is somewhat conflicting; but it is directly proven by the statement of Thomas M. Simpson, second lieutenant of the company aforesaid, that Harris was wounded "while in the service of the United States and while on duty." Congress, by special act, having pensioned the son, thereby acknowledging the obligation of the Government, is concluded from denying the mother's claim, she having clearly shown her dependence on him for support during his life-time.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

OTIS B. ANDERSON.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1601) granting a pension to Otis B. Anderson.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Otis B. Anderson, late a private of Company D, Seventeenth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That the claimant was a private in the Seventeenth Regiment of West Virginia Volunteers in the United States service during the late war, and that he contracted a disease of the eyes while in the service, which has since resulted in total blindness. The claimant applied for a pension under the general pension laws, but his claim has been rejected under section 4717 of the Revised Statutes, five years having expired since filing the same, and the record evidence not being considered sufficient to establish his claim.

The claimant had no medical treatment while in the service, except by the assistant surgeon of the Third West Virginia Volunteers, who testified that he treated him in the summer of 1865, while in the service, for a neuralgic affection of the eyes contracted since his enlistment, and that he has been his family physician since that time, and that his eyes gradually failed from the time of his discharge until some four or five years ago, when the sight became entirely lost, and he has been hopelessly blind ever since.

The Adjutant-General does not seem to regard this evidence as sufficient to "make a record," and therefore, the five years having expired, the claim cannot be allowed under the general pension laws. The evidence is not considered technically sufficient by the Adjutant-General and Commissioner of Pensions to admit the claim, but your committee are satisfied that the evidence is abundant to authorize its allowance.

The petitioner is very poor, and is wholly dependent on public and private charity for support.

No objection being made, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

EDWARD C. WHEELOCK.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 104) granting a pension to Edward C. Wheelock.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Edward C. Wheelock, late a musician in the Third Regiment of Michigan Infantry Volunteers.

The report was read, as follows:

That on the 10th day of June, 1861, Edward C. Wheelock, then a citizen of the county of Allegan, State of Michigan, enlisted in the United States service, in Company F, Third Regiment Michigan Volunteers, as a private, to serve three years or during the war; that said Wheelock was at that time a healthy and sound man; that, in the summer of 1863 the said Wheelock was detached for duty in the third brigade of the third division of the third corps of the Army of the Potomac, which brigade was then commanded by General De Trobriand; that at the battle of Gettysburgh, while in the line of his duty, returning from the delivery of an order which he had been sent to deliver to the One hundred and tenth Pennsylvania Regiment by said General De Trobriand, his horse fell, throwing him violently upon the pommel of his saddle, severely bruising and injuring him in the perinæum and prostate gland, so that he was unable to move for some time; that he was treated by the acting brigade surgeon for about two weeks after receiving said injury, after which he sufficiently recovered from the immediate effects of his injury to return to his duty; but that he has never since that time been free from the troublesome and often painful effects of said injury.

That said petitioner afterward, on the 23d day of December, re-enlisted in the United States service as a veteran, and was transferred to Company F, Fifth Michigan Volunteers, in which he continued to serve till the close of the war, and that he was mustered out July 5, 1865.

That shortly after said Wheelock was mustered out of the service, the injuries received by him at Gettysburgh began to develop into painful and dangerous disease, and he was compelled to put himself under medical treatment. his perinæum became very much inflamed, the prostate gland enlarged, forming a hard tumor, and his bladder became acutely diseased, losing in a great measure its elasticity and contractility. This diseased condition continue to develop until the said Wheelock has become entirely disabled from performing any manual labor, and is a terrible sufferer. That for the last four years, at periods recurring every two hours, said Wheelock has suffered violent paroxysms of pain resulting from a cause necessarily attendant upon the disease of his bladder, and that his disease is pronounced by the examining surgeon incurable.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House favorably.

MARGARET E. COGBURN.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1602) granting a pension to Margaret E. Cogburn.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret E. Cogburn, widow of Hiram J. Cogburn, late a private in Company F of the Second Regiment of Tennessee Volunteers, and pay her a pension at the rate of $8 per month, and $2 per month in addition thereto for each minor child of said Hiram J. and Margaret E. Cogburn until they arrive at the age of sixteen years, respectively.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ANNIE E. FARLEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 318) granting a pension to Annie E. Farley.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Annie Farley, widow of Peter M. Farley, late a private in Company M, Eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Cavalry, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of the act.

The report was read, as follows:

The evidence shows that the petitioner's husband enlisted September 24, 1861, and was honorably discharged the service September 23, 1864, and died on the 25th day of April, 1871.

The Mrs. Annie Farley claims on the ground that the cause of death was the result of disease contracted while in the service and in the line of duty.

The evidence submitted to show that this soldier was a sound and able-bodied man at the time of his enlistment is, in the opinion of the committee, sufficiently clear to establish that fact beyond a reasonable doubt. Dr. S. B. Blanchard states that he was attending physician of this soldier from 1868 up to the time of said soldier's death, and that his death resulted from the effects of pleuro-pneumonia, contracted while in the service of the United States, and from which he had never entirely recovered.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF JAMES B. ARMSTRONG.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 101) amendatory of the act entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of James B. Armstrong, deceased," approved March 3, 1873.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Edward S. Armstrong, of Ralls County, Missouri, the sum of $1,673.14, it being his aliquot share of the sum of $13,385.09, as one of the brothers and next of kin of the said James B. Armstrong, deceased, appropriated by the said act for the relief of the heirs and next of kin of said James B. Armstrong, deceased.

Section 2 repeals the provision of said act requiring satisfactory proof to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury that said heirs at law and next of kin, or such thereof as shall demand their aliquot shares under and by virtue of said act, remained loyal adherents to the cause and Government of the United States during the war of the rebellion.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. FORT. I hope there will be no objection to that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. This is a bill the first bill of the kind; let it come up on some day when we can discuss it.

WILLIAM H. NESSLE.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 37) for the relief of William H. Nessle.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to William H. Nessle the sum of $1,500, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, in full satisfaction for services performed by him at the request of the Attorney-General in an investigation of expenditures of the marshal's office in the western district of Arkansas, pursuant to a resolution of the House of Representatives adopted June 9, 1874.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill with an amendment, to strike out in line 5 the words "one thousand;" so that it will read, "the sum of $500."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, objected.

ALEXANDER ST. BERNARD.

Mr. MORRISON. I wish to withdraw my objection to the bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard.

The bill was again read.

Mr. KASSON. I should be glad to have the gentleman state whether this was an enlisted man.

The CHAIRMAN. The subject is not open to debate.

Mr. CONGER. He was a warrant officer in the Navy, a pilot.

Mr. KASSON. I thought the bill inaugurated a new principle of granting pensions. If it does not, I will not object.

Mr. RUSK. It does not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let it go over until next Friday.

Mr. CONGER. This old man may not live a year longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not open to debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any further objection to the bill being laid aside?

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOLMAN reported that the committee had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had instructed him to report sundry bills to the House, some with and some without amendments, and with the recommendation that they do pass.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

The following bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were severally read the third time and passed without amendment, namely:

A bill (H. R. No. 556) granting a pension to Alexander St. Bernard;

A bill (H. R. No. 231) for the relief of Robert Erwin;

A bill (H. R. No. 247) for the relief of James M. Coffinberry;

A bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKean;

A bill (H. R. No. 31) granting a pension to Patrick Glackin;

A bill (H. R. No. 995) granting a pension to G. W. La Pointe;

A bill (H. R. No. 43) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Neibling;

A bill (H. R. No. 83) for the relief of James A. Hile, of Lewis County, Missouri;

A bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John I. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital;

A bill (H. R. No. 1596) granting a pension to Ruth Ellen Greeland; and

A bill (H. R. No. 933) granting a pension to William D. Cobaugh.

WILLIAM R. DUNCAN.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1598) granting a pension to William R. Duncan.
